Stocks Move Higher

New York (U.P.)—Stocks duplicated last week's feat in rising in the final session after declining in the four previous sessions.
Today's rise was less spectacular than last week's in the rails and better in the industrials. Utilities rose today. They fell last Friday.
Today's recovery was seen as a normal technical one after the four-day decline had knocked 13 points from the industrial average.

Dow-Jones Averages
Dow-Jones final stock averages: 30 Industrials 490.33, up 3.20; 20 Railroads 159.43, up 2.16; 15 Utilities 67.39, up 0.32, and 65 Stocks 173.27, up 1.30.

Is That So?
By Eugene Burns
Ranger-Naturalist
By far the largest and most spectacular of the great apes is the manlike gorilla, numbering today less than 10,000. Bulls reach a height of six feet, a weight of 600 pounds, and with "bare hands" can bend a double barreled shotgun like boiled macaroni. This, and because it lives in Africa's most inaccessible regions, makes it the subject of untold numbers of myths and absurd folklore. To dispel the more common notions, here's a fact vs. fallacy on the gorilla based largely on a new book, "Gorilla Hunter" by Fred Merfield.
Fact: Gorillas are immensely strong, vicious creatures who attack humans without provocation.
Fact: True he is immensely strong. When frightened he has bent a two-inch tempered iron bar. With a pat of his great horny "hand," he can crush a human skull like an eggshell. With a swat, knock a shoulder blade off a man. But by nature he is peace-loving. He never attacks humans deliberately, unless when molested. When cornered or even wounded, he will make every endeavor to get away. He bluffs: upon several occasions Merfield had them rush him within 20 yards—and then they stopped short—and retreated. But should a man's courage fail, Merfield adds, then the gorilla will chase him and wreak terrible wounds with "hands" and nails.
Fallacy: Gorillas spend most of their time swinging from trees, a la Tarzan.
Fact: Gorilla males seldom climb trees—in fact, large males are extremely reluctant to leave the ground. And they never sleep in trees.
Fallacy: In rage, gorillas beat their breasts with their fists.
Fact: In a typical instance, Merfield reports: "The 'Old Man' stood erect and stared at me, screamed and beat his abdomen (not his chest) with his open hands in a rolling movement . . . As for the sounds they make, bulls roar and scream; females rarely make vocal sounds; and the babies 'bawl' exactly as children do."
Fallacy: Gorillas like water and swim expertly.
Fact: They hate water and seldom cross streams even a few yards wide.
Fallacy: Gorillas kill watch dogs and abduct comely village maidens.
Fact: They are terrified of dogs. And as for those comely abducted maidens, . . . first you'd have to find one in Africa. And next, oh well, can't we leave something for Hollywood's imagination?
