Frank Lloyd Wright Tells Detailed Description of Mile-High Building Plan

Editor's Note: Architect Frank Lloyd Wright has announced plans for a mile-high skyscraper. The United Press sent a reporter to interview Wright, and the following is the first detailed description of the architect's almost unbelievable proposal.

By ALFRED LEECH
United Press Correspondent
Spring Green, Wis. — (U.P.) — Architect Frank Lloyd Wright has disclosed details of his proposed mile-high skyscraper, which would "rise like a rapier in the sky" above Chicago's lake front.

"It would be the eighth wonder of the world," he said. "But it would be as simple as ABC." The controversial, 87-year-old architect was interviewed at Taliesin, his rambling, weather-beaten home on a wooded hill in the Wisconsin countryside.

Stainless Steel, Glass
Wright said his skyscraper would be built of stainless steel and glass. Elevators would have their own individual motors powered by nuclear energy. They would rise on cogged tracks at a mile a minute.

The building would be a cantilever structure with a "taproot" foundation extending 1,000 feet beneath the surface. The floors would extend outward from a central steel and concrete core, like limbs from a tree trunk.

Thus, Wright said, the building would be extremely light in weight and low in cost, for there would be no ponderous, rectangular steel skeleton.

All this might sound visionary to the layman, and some people think Wright is indulging in an intellectual prank and pulling the public's leg.

Real and Logical
But it seems real and logical when the white-haired Wright leans over a drafting table and points out the details with a slender, steady forefinger.

Wright launched his mile-high project after a group of Chicagoans came to him with a proposal to build a skyscraper a half-mile high.

"Why a half mile?" he asked. "Why not a mile?"

He said the challenging concept of a skyscraper built like a Christmas tree on the cantilever principle is "nothing

About 21 of 100 railroad workers are in train or engine service.

"It's a shot I've had in my locker for 35 years," said the father of the modern ranch house.

The department of the interior was the seventh division of the executive departments of the United States. It was established by an act of congress in 1849.

Tall persons are said to require more food nourishment because of larger skin surfaces and radiation of body heat.
