Should Children Be Afraid of The Dark?

Dr. Alvarez

Many a parent wonders what to do when a child gets afraid of the dark, and perhaps starts screaming in the middle of the night. Thousands of children refuse to go into a dark room. Some parents feel that they must not give in to this sort of thing, and as a result are extremely cruel to the poor child. I know, because I went through this myself when I was between the ages of 4 and 7. I suffered tortures from having to sleep in a dark room at some distance from the room of my parents. Sometimes, when the wind rubbed a bush against the side of the house, or a rat scuttled under the floor or the wind ruffled up papers on a table, I couldn't stand it any more and would start screaming for my father.

to children is to fill them with the idea of ghosts and bogeymen. I'm pretty sure that, when I was a child, servants filled me with these ideas which later caused me endless distress. I imagine that if I had never heard of ghosts I would have remained without fear of the dark. Fortunately, after I was perhaps eight years of age, I lost my fear of a dark bedroom, and had no further trouble.

Again, I would say that I think all parents ought to be kind to the child who, for a while, fears the dark. It certainly is terribly cruel to deny him a little light in his room. Often his door can be left open into the hall, and a small light can be left burning there. A child should never be punished for becoming frighten-
