University Makes Exchange With Leningrad Library

St. Louis—U.P.—Washington University has successfully concluded its own cultural exchange with a public library in Leningrad, Russia.

Saul Levin, a classics professor, received microfilm of three rare and ancient Hebrew Biblical manuscripts from Leningrad's Saltykov-Shchedrin Library in return for 14 books requested by the Russians, including "The Adventures of Mark Twain."

The exchange required eight months, but was accomplished "directly and with few complications," Levin said. He applied to the Russian embassy in Washington, which forwarded the request directly to the library's director.

The director asked $75 to cover microfilming costs, to be paid in such books as "A Pictorial Treasury of Opera in America," "The Mike Gold Reader," "Economic History of the United States," "Electro-magnetic Waves," "Physical Geology," "Semimicro Qualitative Analysis" and "Dielectric Behavior and Structure."

Levin, who will use the microfilm in a structural comparison he is making between Hebrew and other Semitic languages with Greek, Sanskrit and the Indo-European languages in general, attributed the eight-month delay to "library and microfilming difficulties" rather than to governmental red tape.

The Russian librarian notified Levin that the cost of the microfilming had been overestimated, and invited him to select an additional $50 worth of films. Levin said he probably would order more Hebrew Bible, and perhaps
