Heavenly Sea Visible Near Flying Horse in Southeast

By FAY BENTLEY

How grief-stricken we would be if a huge bird snatched one of our children! After the shepherd-prince, Ganymede, had been carried away, at Jupiter's command, the father was overcome with despair. The lad's companions had seen the eagle fly to Mt. Olympus, but the knowledge that a god had taken his son brought no comfort to the stricken parent.

Jupiter, in an effort to make amends, presented the king with a pair of divine horses but even this was of no avail. Finally, the king of the gods went so far as to place Ganymede with his flowing cup among the "watery" constellations.

That portion of the sky below Pegasus the Flying Horse, in the south and east, is known as the Heavenly Sea. Here we find Aquarius, the Water Pourer; Pisces, the Fishes; Piscis Austrinus, the Southern Fish; Cetus, the Sea Monster; Delphinus, the Dolphin; Equuleus, the Sea Horse; and Capricornus, the Sea Goat.

Because rain always fell in Babylonia, when the sun was between the earth and this region of the sky, the ancient Babylonians always associated this portion of the celestial sphere with water, and named the constellations accordingly.

Most of the animals for which constellations, or sky pictures, are designated were familiar to the people of the Old Testament who lived in Mesopotamia. This leads to the belief that these figures originated in that part of the world. It is believed that most of the constellations and their legends were developed about 2000 years before the birth of Christ, although it is impossible to fix an exact date.

Aquarius, the Water Pourer, is supposed to be Ganymede, the shepherd lad who became cup-bearer for the gods on Mt. Olympus. The Water Pourer, himself, is not plainly shown. However, the Urn or Jar is pictured as a 'Y' of four sparkling stars.
