

Lehman Cave Area Of Nevada Scanned As National Park

Ely, Nev., (UP)—A federal survey team has completed a tour of the high mountains, caves and glaciers in the Lehman Caves—Wheeler Peak of eastern Nevada to determine the feasibility of creation of a "Great Basin Range National Park."

A report on preliminary findings is expected to be made to the National Park Service by its Santa Fe, N.M., regional office in mid-November. If this report is favorable, action by Congress would be required to complete formation of such a park.

The Lehman Caves section of the rugged area is already under Park Service administration as a national monument. The remainder of the proposed park is primarily composed of portions of the Nevada National Forest.

One of the prime movers for expansion of the Lehman Caves National Monument into a national monument is Weldon F. Heald, Tucson, Ariz., author and explorer.

It was Heald who last year discovered and named as the "Mathes Glacier" a glacier filling the valley floor on the north circle of 13,061-foot Mt. Wheeler, Nevada's highest mountain peak, that tops the range near the Utah-Nevada state line near Lehman Caves.

Heald accompanied a party of Park Service officers, naturalists, Forest Service executives and others on a field inspection of the area recently.

The inspection and the preliminary report, when completed, will discuss the various problems and advantages of expanding the present monument into the "Great Basin Range National Park." Included in the report is the change on livestock grazing rights and game animal care. The expanded park would embrace about 28 square miles.

Sen. George W. Malone (R-Nev.), has tentatively endorsed the project, saying that "national park designation of this area which includes the only active glacier in the entire Great Basin as well as the unusually beautiful Lehman caves, will be a boost for the tourist business in the entire state."
