The Family Council

Editor's note: The Family Council consists of a judge, a psychiatrist, three clergymen, a newspaper editor and two writers. Each article is a summary of an actual report. This Family Council does not give advice, it merely reports on problems that have been dealt with by responsible agencies and counselors.

Don W.—My wife doesn't fit in with the crowd. Sue W.—I don't like those people—I want to move away.

Don W.—My wife and I come from a small town and met at a small college. My wife was always very shy and, in general, socially backward. It didn't matter much at that time. I thought her shyness was cute and we didn't have to do much socializing anyway. Now, however, I am connected with a large firm and have a promising career as an executive. We have three children and live in a suburban community where there is lots of entertaining.

I find that I enjoy socializing very much. This is a nice crowd, and I can form excellent business contacts among them. But Sue makes it very difficult. She doesn't like to entertain. She says she can never be friends with these people. She doesn't dress or act in the right way to fit in with them. She just doesn't want to become sophisticated.

Sue W.—Don seems to have forgotten the time when we used to agree about the kind of people he now admires. We called them "phonies" then—not sophisticated. Don does not realize that in accepting these people, he rejects the people who do not fit in with them.

There was a time, too, when Don agreed with me about such things as married people flirting around and too much drinking at parties. We thought such things were pretty contemptible. He doesn't seem to object any longer and does far too much drinking himself.

Maybe I'm just a small town girl, but I can't be happy here. I don't want to bring up my children in this community. I feel we should get out make a new start elsewhere. I think this is more important than business.

Nebraska is a comparatively treeless flat state with little natural water but it has the third largest bird list in the nation including many varieties of tame and wild waterfowl.
