Chicago — (UP) — The new boss of the International Association of Chiefs of Police is known around Chicago as a scholarly cop who delights in sending his patrolmen to school, although he can't afford the time for classrooms.

"I send everybody else to school," said George A. Otletwis, chief of Chicago's Park District police, "but I can't make it myself—much as I'd like to."

Instead, the 53-year-old police chief has had to get most of his education by reading whenever he can find the time.

Criminology, sociology and classic literature are the mainstays of his personal library, and he picks up books on nearly anything from office management to criminal law at the Park District's library.

Otletwis regrets that the new extra job might cut down a little on his reading, but he relishes IACP goals as important to all police work.

"We have members everywhere but behind the Iron Curtain," Otletwis said, "and there's splendid cooperation between foreign police and our police."

As boss of all the chiefs, one of Otletwis' biggest jobs is to select the men who make up the IACP's numerous committees in different fields of police work.

"We have to have outstanding men," he said, leafing through a bound volume of the reports made out each year by the committees.

The men on the committees collect their ideas on law enforcement in various police specialties, such as narcotics, auto theft, homicide, and forward them to their committee chiefs.

This way, Otletwis explained, the best methods and ideas are culled from all over the world.

A big problem facing the scholarly cop, who has spent 32 years on the force, is recruiting new policemen.

"It's critical," he said. "Recruitment of good men is especially hard in the United States because of the opportunities offered by industry."
