Modeling Leads To Successes

By JACK SCHEMEIL
United Press Correspondent
Paris — (U.P.) — Ambitious young women could draw inspiration from the careers of nine former star fashion models.

On the basis of their success, being a Paris model must be one of the surest ways of gaining a place in the sun.

Some four to six years ago there were nine star models in Paris. They were Bettina, Tania, Sylvie, Ivy, Fabienne, Colette, Paule, Christiane and Sophie. Here is what has become of those nine:

Bettina, a pretty red-head who starred in Jacques Fath's collections, is the constant companion of Prince Aly Khan. There is much talk of an impending wedding for this shapely young woman who was born in the provincial village of Elbeuf of poor parents.

Tania, whose beautiful black eyes made her one of the French capital's favorite models at Christian Dior's, married a multi-millionaire Italian. Of Russian origin, Tania frequently returns to the site of her former glory—but this time as a valuable customer.

Sylvie, who was reputed to have the smallest waist in Paris, worked for Dior before she went to the United States where she became engaged to the famed Parisian jeweler, Claude Cartier. She broke off her engagement to become the wife of the French film star Daniel Gelin.

Ivy Nicholson, was 20 when she landed in Paris from the United States. In a few months she had become France's most popular cover-girl. She left for Italy where it was rumored she would marry one of two Italian princes. But she married neither and finally became a highly successful photographer.

Fabienne, a pretty brunette, before working for Madeleine de Rauch and Carven, earned a living posing for advertising photographs. For a while she travelled throughout the world presenting French fashions.

In 1954 she married French film director Bernard Borderie and now is well on the way to becoming a film star.

A Parachutist
Colette Duval, star model of Germaine Lecomte, is a brunette who gained world fame by establishing a number of parachuting world records. This adventurous woman was an unsuccessful candidate in the last French general elections. Her latest hobby is stock racing cars.

Paule was hired by Fath himself and she soon became one of the most successful models and cover girls. She married a French newspaperman and is now the mother of two children.

Christiane de Boisson, who began as a model for Schiaparelli at 17, probably was France's shortest model. Despite her smallness she soon became a star model. She is now a highly successful society columnist for a mass-circulation French weekly.

Sophie, who worked for Hermes and Fath, became a highly successful cover girl in the United States. She conquered the heart of Hollywood director Anatole Litvak, who married her recently. In addition she runs a successful French women's journal.

TREASURE RETURNED

The famous 800-year-old "Guelph Treasure" has been returned to its home in Hanover, Germany, after its war-time dispersal and re-collection, according to the German Tourist Information Office. The treasure, a collection of magnificent reliquaries and other art work of precious metals, enamel and ivory, was originally kept in the cathedral of Brunswick after it was started by Duchess Gertrud of Brunswick-Lueneburg in the 11th century. It has been housed in Hanover since the 17th century, and today is valued at more than ten million D-marks (over $2,500,000).

You can remove rust spots from the chrome on car bumpers and grille by rubbing the rusted areas with hand-size pads of folded aluminum foil.

WAIT FOR ME!

NOV. 18th

Washington — (U.P.) — Mamie Eisenhower celebrated her 60th birthday anniversary today looking younger than when she became first lady four years ago.

Despite her love for her Gettysburg, Pa., farm, White House life obviously agrees with the feminine half of the "Ike and Mamie" team.

Mrs. Eisenhower currently has few official functions on her calendar. She is resting from the campaign and election and gathering energy for coming holiday and inaugural festivities.

A small intimate family celebration is expected to mark her birthday. The only public date on her schedule is to receive a full-length portrait of herself in her 1952 inaugural gown from the National Citizens for Eisenhower Committee.

A birthday party dinner tonight will include Maj. and Mrs. John Eisenhower and the four Eisenhower grandchildren; Mrs. Eisenhower's mother, Mrs. John S. Doud; and Mrs. Eisenhower's sister, Mrs. George Gordon Moore and her four children, including two married boys who have three youngsters of their own.

Private Gifts
The President's birthday gift to "My Mamie" is likely to be kept private. But he has been known, husband-like, to give her something for the Gettysburg farm house as well as more personal mementos.

After her husband's heart attack in September, 1955, there were reports that Mrs. Eisenhower would prefer that he retire from the stress and strain of public life to the quiet of their renovated farm house.

She celebrated her 59th birthday on the day she and the President returned from Denver to Gettysburg last year for his recuperation from his heart illness.

But close friends insisted, and later were borne out publicly by the President himself, that the first lady was going happily along with her husband's decision to run again.

During the autumn, she also seemed to enjoy the campaign trail, despite her dislike of flying and her reported "stage fright" at appearing before large groups of people.

In Demand by Crowds
Naturalness and friendliness were all that seemed apparent to the throngs of people who called for "Mamie" almost as often as they chanted for "Ike."

Mrs. Eisenhower's enjoyment at meeting all kinds of people—school children as well as prime ministers—is one of the things that has made White House entertaining less formal during her tenure as first lady. It also has prompted millions of Americans to write her a flood of mail which usually swells to about 15,000 pieces a week during the Christmas season.

Now that the election is over and the Eisenhowers settle down for another four years in the White House, the answer Mrs. Eisenhower gave to a visiting school girl almost four years ago still seems to stand. The youngster asked how Mrs. Eisenhower liked living in the big mansion. The first lady replied with her infectious grin:

"Wouldn't you like to live in the White House?"

Olympic Trainer Predicts Wins For American Women Athletes

By VIVIAN SANDE
United Press Correspondent
New York — (U.P.) — American women athletes are getting easier to watch all the time. They're better looking and better sports-women, too.

So says Roxanne Anderson, chairman of the Olympic women's track and field committee, who is manager of the U. S. women's track and field team.

Roxy is a champion who was dubbed "the most beautiful" contender at the 1936 Olympic trials, although she lost in the semi-finals that year. For the past few years, since a bad appendix put her out of competition, Mrs. Anderson has been coaching and working with Olympic track and field hopefuls.

"The days when only tomboyish girls went in for competitive sports are gone," said Mrs. Anderson. "Now on a dance floor, you can't tell a social deb from a would-be gold medal winner."

Travel Appeal
She said amateur competitive sports attract more attractive girls and explained:

"Most of our girls now are high school and college students. They want to travel. And in competitive sports they can see the world, have fun, and contribute to international good will, with all expenses paid."

She also said track and field competition helps to keep women beautiful.

"It's the best figure-builder there is," she said.

Of the performance of the current crop of Olympics contenders and the girls who tried out for the team, Mrs. Anderson
