

School Age Child Said Forgotten

New York—(U.P.)—One child expert believes school-age children are the "forgotten generation" in most community programs.

The head of the Children's Bureau in Washington, Dr. Martha Eliot, said the working mother is here to stay, but the nation still neglects her grade school children.

Dr. Eliot pointed in a recent talk here that communities have done much to care for young children while their mothers are at work. And programs are growing rapidly to steer teenagers from un-supervised activities that often lead to delinquency. But children in elementary school still are left largely to their own devices.

One reason for this lack of progress, said Dr. Eliot, is that communities are not sure just how to set up a wholesome program. So this government expert advised them to turn to the national play school program for a blueprint.

The Play School Association now is celebrating its 40th anniversary. It was set up during World War I to encourage mothers to work for defense.

Dr. Eliot said the association's program can be a model for centers where grade school children have a good time and express themselves in both work and play. But, she warned, day-care centers must be more than just glorified baby-sitters. They should start giving children what they need for healthy growth and development.

Forty-Hour Week Not for Housewife Say Researchers

New York—(U.P.)—Some of the nation's housewives want to know who is lucky enough to work that 40-hour week.

And as for all that talk about the 30-hour week to come, well... average a 14-hour work day, which if you counted Saturdays and Sundays would make a 98-hour work week. Some of them, mothers of three or more small children, averaged two loads of wash six days a week and did their ironing between 9 p.m. and midnight.

These facts were derived from interviews with young families by Ladies' Home Journal researchers. A sampling of 48 families interviewed for the publication's series on how young America lives, showed that the mother of three or four children works 17. Eighty-two per cent averages a 14-hour day and often said husband helped with the children; 39 1/2 per cent said hubby gave a hand with both children and housework; 18 per cent said their spouses helped not at all at home.
