Christmas Card Industry Said Woman's Field

It's truly a woman's world at Christmastime — especially where Christmas cards are concerned.

Women buy four-fifths of the nation's Christmas cards, and no wonder! Most of our Yuletide greetings are rhymed, designed, ornamented—and sold—by the fair sex.

And just to make sure the greeting card industry never overlooks the woman's viewpoint, several of the nation's greeting card publishers have women as their presidents!

The friendly charm of Christmas cards is credited largely to this "feminine touch" in their creation. Their warm-heartedness contrasts strongly with that other familiar year-end art form, the illustrated calendar, which is published primarily to meet masculine tastes.

Most greeting card verse writers are women, many of whom jot down sparkling rhymes in spare moments between household chores. Over half of the full-time greeting card artists are women. Their deft, sympathetic touch is preferred for certain types of paintings, such as whimsical cherubs and religious designs.

Do Hand Work — Women do practically all the exacting hand work that lends richness and sparkle to Christmas cards—attaching sequins, puffed stain inserts, completing trick folds, and dusting snow scenes with frosty cellophane flakes.

Even selling greeting cards is largely a woman's field whether it's in a department store, across the counter of a gift or stationery shop, or by publisher's representatives who call at the buyer's home.

The distaff influence on Christmas cards is hardly a new development, though. Louis Prang, a Boston publisher of chromos, issued the first line of American Christmas cards in 1875.
