Is That So?

Meet the biggest baby in the world. As you might have suspected, it's the whale's calf. A 70-foot whale may give birth to a 24-foot calf weighing up to 25,000 pounds; a 40-footer contained a 17-foot fetus; and the blackfish, also a whale, usually bears a calf almost half of its own length. Despite the gigantic size of the young, these marine mammals seem to undergo no particular difficulty in bearing their hairless calves. But then, in water an animal's weight is suspended. Their bones are filled bulk of their unborn, the female may have up to a hundred great accordion-like folds on her underside capable of tremendous expansion. The unborn young is carried about 11 months; twins are rare. When born, it swims.
