

Housewives Like Domestic Life, Poll Indicates

By GAY PAULEY
United Press Correspondent

Some housewives wouldn't swap their aprons for a movie star's mink. A questionnaire sent to young homemakers in Levittown, N. Y., showed most of them happy as "just housewives" and a bit fed up with all this stuff printed about their boredom and dissatisfaction.

The Tide Washing Clinic, a consumer service organization, questioned 108 women. Only 14 said they disliked domesticity and wished they had office jobs. "I hate housework," said one young matron bluntly.

"Too many children . . . I'm run ragged," said another.

But among the 94 who liked their roles, there were such glowing comments as, ". . . I'm blessed with two nice little girls, a car . . . a TV set. Who could ask for anything more?"

"Sure I like this job," said another. "It's one I can't get fired from."

The questionnaire also asked whether the women thought they were good homemakers.

Eighty-four rated themselves excellent. But one honest lady said that sometimes "there are fuzzysuzzies under the bed, and the ironing gets dangerously ahead of me. The closets can't take too close inspection; and there are those days when everything goes wrong and my mother-in-law drops in."

Magazine Urges Restaurants To Serve Diet Foods

What is a person who is following a medically prescribed diet to do when he has to eat away from home? Few restaurants make any provision for the large number of persons who, under physician's orders, are limited in their food choices. Perhaps they are on a low sodium diet; or are barred from eating sugar; or must not eat foods containing considerable fat; or are on a low carbohydrate diet. Failure to adhere to diet restrictions may cause severe injury in some cases. In an article in Restaurant Management Magazine, W. W. Bauer proposes that restaurant operators should perform a public service and also increase their revenues by learning how to provide for customers who cannot eat just anything. To initiate this service, he says, "requires only a slight change in the menu" in many cases. "The addition of fresh fruit, water packed fruits and cheese to every dessert list would render a great service to the diet restricted customers. Skim milk is another item this group would appreciate." Artificial sweeteners should be available, he says; and the chef should learn what a low-sodium diet really is and why it is important. He thinks the clientele would gladly pay for the extra expense necessary to serve low-sodium food.

Red Skelton's Son Victim of Leukemia

Hollywood —(U.P.)—The Red Skelton show was shown on film instead of telecast "live" because the comedian was "completely broken up" by a recent disclosure that his son is dying of leukemia, the Columbia Broadcasting System said today.

A CBS spokesman said instead of the live telecast a film made last month by Skelton was used. The film was one of five scheduled for later this year.

Skelton's red-haired son, Richard, 9, has been given five months to a year to live by doctors who discovered last week that the boy is suffering with the incurable disease. Richard is undergoing treatment at UCLA Medical Center but is unaware of the fatal nature of the illness.
