

Japanese Changing Attitude Toward U.S. Citizens in Homeland

Tokyo—UP—What if all the Yanks in Japan obeyed the constant cry "Yankee, go home!"?

Aside from the political significance, it would mean a loss of almost half a billion dollars a year to the Japanese—enough to wipe out more than half this island's trade deficit.

The Japanese are beginning to realize this, and many are changing the cry to, "Hey, Yank, please stay."

Figures released by American officials show Japan still is dependent on U. S. military dollars.

Most of the $470 million spent last year went for official purchases from Japanese firms. But $128 million was spent by individual soldiers, sailors, marines and airmen, buying tatami mats for their offbase apartments or shipping souvenir kimonos back home. Mess halls, officers' clubs and similar activities spent another $87 million.

Japan realized $2.5 billion from its exports during 1956. American sources say it was significant that U. S. military spending equalled 20 per cent of those earnings.

American dollars, coupled with U. S. economic aid, enabled Japan to end the year with a $293 million balance in the foreign exchange treasury despite the fact imports exceeded exports.

"It is our hope that Japan can build up its exports to the point where it no longer will be dependent on military spending," a U. S. Treasury Department official said.

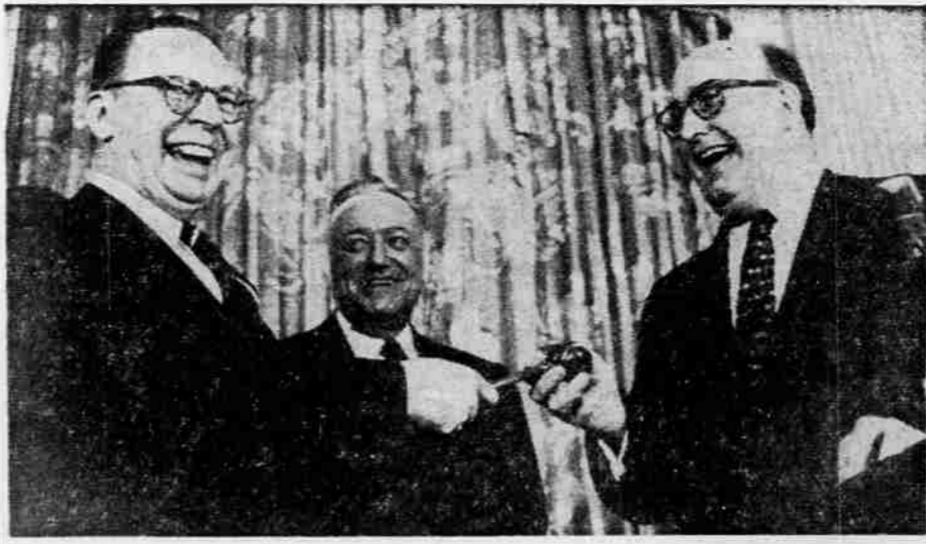

Wound Up in Red

Exports increased 24.4 per cent last year over 1955, but imports jumped 20.7 per cent and Japan still wound up $728 million in the red on its trade.

The United States cut back the number of servicemen in Japan last year but increased its spending. This resulted from more local purchase of the goods and services needed to maintain the huge U. S. military installations here.

Japanese firms received the largest contracts for coal, transportation, wood and wood products, office machine repairs and office supplies. The U. S. spent more than $1 million in Japan for perishable foods.
