Long-Term Public Trend Moving Toward Integration

New York — (U.P.) — The long-term trend of public attitude on the troubled issue of racial desegregation has moved steadily in the direction of integration during the past 15 years and it may even be accelerating, according to a report made public recently by Herbert H. Hyman and Paul B. Sheatsley, social scientists and specialists in the field of public opinion.

In commenting on the results of a study conducted intermittently by the National Opinion Research Center since 1942, they said, "The problem of Negro-white relations in the U.S. involves a number of factors including those of issues based on use of public carriers and housing as well as segregation in the schools. In its surveys this year the NORC inquired about all three, employing the questions: 'Do you think white students and Negro students should go to the same schools or to separate schools?' Generally speaking, do you think there should be separate sections for Negroes on streetcars and buses? 'If a Negro with the same income and education as you moved into your block, would it make any difference to you?' Their article appeared in the Scientific American.

"Based on the answers to these questions, supplemented by further questions to clarify ambiguity in the answers, 60 per cent of the white U.S. population as a whole favors integration on public transportation, 51 per cent do not object to living near Negroes, but only a minority of 48 per cent support school integration. Of course there were wide differences between the North and South: In the North a majority favor integration in all three situations; in the South a majority oppose it in all three. Perhaps the most striking result here is the fact that among the three aspects of integration, the North is the least tolerant toward residential proximity, while the South is more tolerant toward this than toward desegregation in schools or transportation.

"In the South, where public mixing is barred by law, many whites nevertheless do not object to informal social contacts with Negroes. A Charlotte, N.C., housewife said: 'I can't see any harm in it. I don't mind living beside them but I don't want the children going to school with

Professional Acting Talent Migrating In Pacific Area

Honolulu — (U.P.) — A migration of professional acting talent is under way in the Pacific as the ever-expanding television medium and the airlines combine to make the world smaller.

Since the opening of television stations in Melbourne and Sydney, Australia, recently there has been a steady stream of actors and technicians going from the United States to the land "down under."

One of these is Patricia Romero, 25, an Australian actress who had worked for two years doing supporting roles and bit parts on television in the United States.

"I'm going back to Australia because I believe there is a great future there," said Pat. "I know I won't make as much money as I did in America, but it is a great challenge — and a much better chance for quick stardom."

Dancing at the Oasis night club in Honolulu is a 26-year-old Japanese girl named Takiko Mogi, who can't speak a word of English.

She came to the "promised land" for excitement, to further her career — and, mainly, to boost her earnings to astronomical proportions in comparison with what she made in Tokyo.

"My salary in Tokyo was $22 a month," said Takiko through interpreter Bill Pacheco, one-time football star and now owner of the Oasis. "Out of that I had to pay my own board and room, buy my clothes and so on."

"Here I will make $150 per month, plus board and room, hospital expenses, insurance, etc. It totals about $400 per month, really."

Pacheco, incidentally, has imported 11 Japanese girls to work at his club, and in turn has sent six of these to the mainland to work in clubs there.

The Japanese girls claim they love Honolulu and would like to visit the mainland.

"It used to sound so far away, like a dream," said Kaoru Kurihara, 21. "But it only takes a few hours to get here from Tokyo, and only a few more to get to the states."

Gerald K. — I don't know which girl to marry. Mrs. H. K. — It should be Mathilda.

Gerald K. — I am 18 years old, a high school graduate and about to go into the service. Before I go in, however, I would like to get married.

My problem is that there are two girls I would like to marry. Mathilda is the one I think I like best, but she is two years older than I am. She's very pretty and we have wonderful times together, but I think maybe she is too old for me. She always tries to boss me.

Grace is 17 and she's very nice too. She looks up to me and will do anything I tell her, but she's not as pretty or as much fun to go out with as Mathilda.

I have to decide in a hurry because both girls say they are sick of waiting around for me to make up my mind.

Mrs. H. K. — My husband and I feel Gerald would be better off marrying Mathilda because she is more mature and will have a steady influence on him. She also has a good job and will be able to build up some savings while Gerald is in the service.

We tell Gerald that the age difference seems like a big one, but as he gets older it won't matter. Grace is still a school-girl and expects that marriage will just be a picnic and she'll have nothing at all to do.

Gerald is the youngest of our children, and we are getting on in years, so we would like to see him safely married. He doesn't seem to know what he wants to do about his future, and mar-

Specialist Urges Culling of Cows

Corvillis — Recent reports of low milk production per cow in Oregon compared to cows of neighboring states point up the need for closer culling of animals, according to Harold Ewalt, Oregon State college extension dairy specialist.

Ewalt says the reports are somewhat misleading, however, in failing to recognize differences in breeds when drawing comparisons among areas. Oregon has a predominance of high-testing breeds that place the state next to the top in the nation in richness of milk or average milkfat percentage.

On a 4 per cent milkfat basis, Ewalt reports that cows on standard Dairy Herd Improvement testing for Oregon and adjoining states in 1955 carried the following averages: California, 10,417 pounds of milk per cow; Oregon, 10,097; Washington, 9,978; and Idaho, 9,423.
