The Medical Roundup

by Walter Alvarez

Emeritus Consultant in Medicine, Mayo Clinic
Emeritus Professor of Medicine, Mayo Foundation

Big Legs

Many women keep begging me for help in regard to their big legs. Usually, they have what is called a lymphedema, which is probably a congenital or inborn abnormality in the little channels or vessels in the tissues under the skin—channels which carry the lymph, a watery substance which bathes the cells. This disease has nothing to do with varicose veins, and removal of such veins is not likely to help. I just had a letter from a woman with one big leg who says her surgeon twice opened her abdomen hoping, I imagine, to find some obstruction around the big veins, but he did not find any.

Dr Alvarez

Unfortunately, there is no medicine that I know of that can be taken by mouth to affect the condition in the slightest. There are at least two operations devised for the surgical removal of the thick layer of tissue under the skin, but they are big operations, and surgeons to whom I have talked are not keen about attempting them.

One helpful thing a woman can do if she has big legs, is not to get fat. That makes matters much worse. It is possible that in some cases the wearing of an elastic bandage could help.

Old-Fashioned Orphan Asylum

A while ago I spoke of the passing of the old orphan asylum with the children all in uniform, and all largely deprived of any individuality or of the love and personal attention that they so craved.

Later a man of 70 wrote to tell me that when he was seven, he was put into such an asylum, and for the next seven years was painfully hungry because there was so little food available. At Easter time, when the children were given a hard-boiled egg, my correspondent says that many of them just handled it and stroked it, looking forward to eating it. Finally, they began to nibble at it, and some made it last for three days! This was the only egg they had in a year!

The children were often beaten, sometimes severely. Thank goodness, in most places today the demand for children to be adopted is greater than the supply, and the only children likely to be left in a home are those with some severe handicap, such as a low intelligence. And now I understand that in some states they are finding that there are people with hearts and sympathies big and warm enough so that they are willing and happy to take into their homes some of these poor little crippled and handicapped children, and are finding joy in giving them love and care.

It makes me proud of my fellow men and women when I read such things! In most places an effort is made to give the child the sort of home from which his parents came. Then both the child and the foster parents are likely to be happy together. I might here warn people again not to buy "boot-leg babies." Many a person who does this gets himself into a mess. Later, he can be blackmailed, or the child's mother can come and demand that her child be returned to her.

There is just one good way in which to get a baby for adoption, and that is legally, through a fine agency. The people that run the agency know all about the child's parents but will never divulge the information. They will investigate the people who come asking for a baby, to make sure that they are likely to give him (or her) a comfortable and loving home and a good education.
