Religious Officials Report of Suburban Church Concentration

By LOUIS CASSELS
United Press Correspondent

Washington—(U.P.)—America's "church boom" is heavily concentrated in suburbs and small towns, religious leaders said today.

They reported that while overall U. S. church enrollment has been soaring to an all-time high of more than 100 million, churches in rural areas and in the downtown sections of big cities—the two extremes of population density—have been losing members steadily.

The uneven impact of the back-to-church movement is now under close study by officials of major denominations. Here are some of the facts they have established.

Most of the thousands of new churches built since World War II have gone up in suburban areas. Even so, the typical suburban church has an overflowing congregation and is casting about for more space.

During the same period, rural churches have been closing at a rate of nearly 1,000 a year. Many of those still open are struggling for survival with sharply reduced membership and budgets.

Protestant churches, particularly, are disappearing from the "inner city" at what the National Council of Churches calls "an alarming rate." For example, only two major Protestant churches survive in downtown St. Louis, three in Cleveland's inner city.

Part of the answer—but only part—is the great shift in population that has occurred since the war. The suburbs have swollen enormously, while rural and downtown areas have lost population.

A related factor in the plight of downtown churches is the influx of many Negro residents into neighborhoods formerly occupied almost entirely by whites.

Churches located in these "changing neighborhoods" are confronted with a choice between racial integration or going to the suburbs with their white parishioners.

Some pioneering churches have chosen to stand fast and tackle the problems by achieving "color blind" Christian fellowship. But many more have taken the easier course of selling their valuable downtown land and using the money to relocate in the suburbs.

Diagnosing the trouble of rural churches is more complicated. Dr. James M. Carr of the Presbyterian church, says they are folding because "they aren't doing the job they're supposed to do" and are "failing to meet the needs of the people."
