Congresswoman Discusses School, Indian Problems

President Eisenhower's new foreign policy for the Middle East, federal aid to education and termination of federal control for the Klamath Indians were discussed by Congresswoman Edith Green at a luncheon given in her honor by Jackson county Democrats yesterday noon at the Medford hotel. Mrs. Green said that the legislation concerning the Klamath Indians was probably the most important problem facing Oregon at this time since it involved grave changes in the lives of more than 2,000 persons and would have far-reaching effects in the economic welfare of the area.

Representative Green said she voted against the resolution which would give President Eisenhower special powers in determining policies and action in the Middle East because she believed the president already has sufficient power to handle any situation which might arise. Passage of the resolution would set a dangerous precedent and actually weaken the power of the executive since he might then have to ask for special legislation to handle comparable situations in the future, she stressed. She criticized the rules committee for having limited debate on this to five hours.

While the resolution is being referred to as a "foreign policy," Mrs. Green said actually it is not a "policy" since no basic issues are being outlined. Continuing this discussion, the congresswoman said that while in principle she supported aid to foreign countries, she believed such aid should be scrutinized thoroughly to see that it actually aided the people of the nations involved and did not perpetuate conditions which are "sowing the seeds of communism."

Mrs. Green discussed House Bill I, which provides federal aid to build schools, predicting that the bill would be passed. Speaking of the Powell amendment, which would prevent districts which practice segregation from receiving federal aid, Mrs. Green said she had supported it and said that in many ways "the amendment is more important than the bill."

The speaker emphatically denied Republican campaign statements to the effect that the Democrats had defeated the school bill last session, and supported her contention with figures on the voting.

Mrs. Green said she sometimes wondered about the sense of values of Americans who spend billions each year on tobacco, alcoholic beverages, cosmetics, movies and even chewing gum, but object to the cost of schools.

Reviewing the Klamath Indian termination problem, Mrs. Green said that great harm to the Indians may result from too-hasty ending of federal controls. "Why rush into termination," she asked, and added that "said as it may be, the truth of the matter is that wherever termination is being speeded, there is valuable property belonging to the Indians which the white men want."

Mrs. Green declared that turning over of the valuable forested land to the Indians may mean its speedy sale piecemeal to those who will cut the timber for immediate sale regardless of consequences. Those interested in conservation and in stabilizing the economy of the area wish to defer termination until some plan can be worked out whereby either the federal government, the state of Oregon or the Indians themselves can harvest the timber in an orderly, sustained yield fashion, she said. Mrs. Green last year introduced what she called a "stop gap" measure which would defer termination nine months beyond the contemplated date, but no action on the bill was taken before congress adjourned.

Mrs. Green further pointed out that the termination legislation makes no provision for the miners on the Klamath reservation, although about half of the Indian population is engaged in mining, and added that some of the Indians are not competent to handle their business affairs. In the case of the Choctaws, she said, as much as 59 per cent of the money due some Indians was "swallowed up" by the fees of attorneys supposedly helping them.

Speaking of the budget presented to congress by the president, Mrs. Green stated that by throwing the responsibility of cutting the budget on the shoulders of congressmen, the Democrats would be accused of failing to follow the president's wishes if they did not cut it, and would be accused of being spendthrifts if they allowed it to stand.

Larry Sheehan, county Democratic chairman, presided. Edward C. Kelly presented Mrs. Green a pair of myrtlewood book ends as a gift from party members. Also introduced were District Attorney Thomas Reeder; Mrs. Kelly, a former county chairman; Mrs. Donna Straus, Robert Boyer, state Democratic chairman; County Treasurer Karl Janouch and Mrs. Janouch, Judge Rawles Moore and County Commissioner Ralph James. Mr. Boyer introduced Representative Green.
