The Medical Roundup

Retarded Children Can Be Helped

Because sometimes I comment on the fact that a number of retarded children have inherited their difficulty from someone else in the family who has some disease of the nervous system (usually a mild feeble-mindedness), quite a few persons have written angrily to say that I have done the cause of retarded children a terrible disservice. They accuse me of inferring that when feeble-mindedness is inherited it is hopeless and nothing can be done. Of course, I never inferred that or said that. Actually, for the last four years I have been trying in every way I could to help mothers with retarded children to learn how to help them and teach them to be useful and perhaps even self-supporting. Every time I find an instructive book that the mothers of retarded children can use, I comment on it.

Now I find on my desk a delightful book called "Retarded Children Can Be Helped," written by Maya Pines, with a remarkable series of photographs by that master of his profession, Cornell Caps (Chanel Press, Great Neck, N.Y.). In the book one sees children, at play and at work, learning to do many useful things.

On page 70, the authors say that 67 per cent of retarded children could be taught even to hold a paying job. Many can perform happily certain monotonous tasks in a factory which highly intelligent persons might find too boring. A child with a mental age of five and an I.Q. of as low as 33 can be taught to wash dishes, to sandpaper furniture, to scrub and polish floors, to put laundry through a mangle, or to weave with a loom. A person who has never grown mentally beyond the age of six can mow a lawn, mix cement, assist in laying bricks, handle freight, make brushes, or do simple work in a laundry. A lad with a mental age of 7 can be taught to help in repairing shoes, to assist a blacksmith, to run a plane, to do simple carpentry, to caw chairs, to do rough painting, to pack small articles in a factory, and to perform domestic chores.

With a mental age of from 9 to 10, and an I.Q. between 60 and 86, a man or woman can work at a number of jobs in a factory; he can repair furniture, make pottery, cut out and make dresses, do plain cooking and canning, sew on buttons, or employ a broiler, or work with an electrician or a steam-fitter.

Quite a few retarded persons might earn good money if they could be employed in a so-called sheltered workshop, where they would not be forced to keep pace with normal workers or to compete with them, or where they would receive special instruction and have good supervision.

As the writer says, for a lad with the mental age of, let us say, 9 years, even the details of the job of being a messenger might be explained repeatedly and in great detail. Persons who have written books on retarded children tell how even such simple tasks as dressing and undressing must, for a while, be taught. The highly intelligent child often refuses to be taught or helped; he says "Let me alone, I'll do it myself," and he does. The very dull child has to be taught how to get along properly with other people, and he must learn what to do with his leisure time. Otherwise, he may just sit.

The book is full of just such information as the parents of a retarded child so greatly need. Dr. Alvarez hopes his readers will understand that it would be impossible for him to answer requests for information or to attempt to diagnose by mail.

Washington (U.P.)—A House judiciary subcommittee has approved President Eisenhower's civil rights program and sent it to the full committee for action next Tuesday.

To Mr. Eisenhower's four-point proposal the subcommittee added four amendments. Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) said the amendments were designed to make the bill "less unpalatable in the South."

The bill would set up a bipartisan commission empowered to investigate civil rights violations and set up a civil rights division in the Justice Department. It also would strengthen protections for the right to vote. The government also would be authorized to seek injunctions or other relief directly from the courts to prevent civil rights violations.

Washington (U.P.)—The United States has announced that Edward Thompson Wailes, American minister to Hungary, is being called home as a result of the dispute with Communist Hungary over his status.
