Busiest Wind Tunnel Resumes Operations

Buffalo, N.Y. — (U.P.) — The 1,000-mile-an-hour wind tunnel at Cornell Aeronautical Laboratory — one of the aviation industry's busiest test facilities — has resumed operations following a five-month $2,225,000 modification program.

Automatic data recording and computing equipment is an important new feature of the tunnel, which can turn up 32,000 horse-power. Developed by CAL, the equipment completely processes test data minutes after measurements are taken on a model in the facility. This operation previously required up to 48 hours.

The tunnel is capable of testing aircraft, missiles and propellers at speeds up to 1.3 times the speed of sound and at varying pressures — from one-sixth to two and one-half atmospheres. Its new 8 by 8 foot test section employs "perforated" walls which permit accurate performance measurement on models at transonic speeds.

The bulk of the nation's operational jet fighter planes and many commercial aircraft, including all three of the forthcoming jet transports to be flown in this country, have been tested in the CAL tunnel.

Woodpeckers' Ratta-Tat-Tat Causing Utility Company Executives Headaches

University Park, Pa. — (U.P.) — A ratta-tat-tat, a ratta-tat-tat, a ratta-tat-tat, ratta-tat-tat.

This is no parade. And it's certainly no picnic. Dryocopus pileatus is driving them crazy.

For two years scientists at Pennsylvania State University have been trying to figure out how to stop woodpeckers from lurching on the power line poles of public utility companies.

Woody just goes peck-peck-pecking along.

Shooting Punishable
Shoot them? That's a federal crime punishable with a $500 fine and six months in jail.

Paint the poles with strips of color? The researchers tried that, and the woodpeckers while showing a preference for cerise, kept on drilling neat holes in rainbow colors, three inches deep, nine inches wide, 12 inches long.

Install electrical persuaders to give the hard-headed creatures a mild shock? That didn't work, nor did noisemakers triggered by the birds themselves.

Metal Poles Too Expensive
Make the poles out of metal, as a retired New Jersey engineer suggested? It costs too much. The whole idea is that 100 pecks a minute weakens the poles, and service is interrupted to install new ones.

An 11-year-old girl wrote sincerely "If some sort of insulation could be used to keep the humming sound out of the poles, I'm sure the woodpeckers would lose interest since they are interested only in food. Please give this suggestion attention, since it is the result of my undivided interest."

A Connecticut house holder backed this up with the claim

Klamath Canal Project Unopposed
Washington — (U.P.) — Interior Secretary Fred Seaton has informed Congress that his department has no objection to a House measure which would direct him to determine the best means of eliminating the hazards of an open canal within the city of Klamath Falls, Ore.

The main canal of the Klamath project has a stretch of more than 5½ miles within the city, which is open ditch since 1919.

Seaton called the House joint resolution a "humanitarian measure."

He added "since it may be a forerunner of more extensive and expensive legislation, however, Congress should consider either making such costs non-reimbursable or, if repayment is to be called for, it should be spread over a number of years."

that his woodpeckers went away when he shut off the buzz in his electric clock.

The scientists discovered that the woodpeckers also peck on poles that carry no current and the drill holes to store as well as get food.

No Report on Scarecrow
Put up a "scare crow," perhaps? One power company ordered three dozen models of a king bird, a pugnacious fellow the woodpeckers are supposed to fear. There's been no report that this worked either.

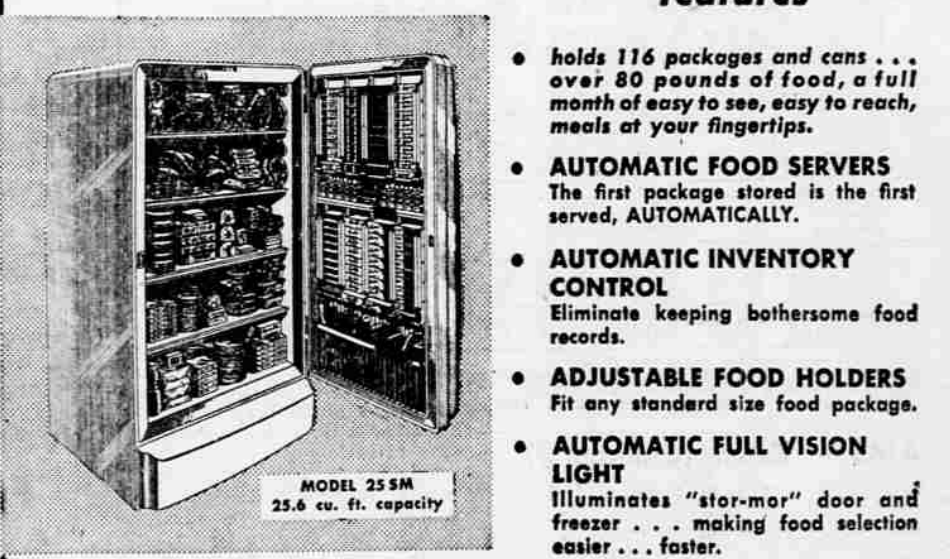

Fifty different chemical mixtures failed to do the trick. So did heavy mesh hardware cloth (which the birds chopped through and threaded from the poles), red flannel streamers (which the birds ignored) and the lashing of new poles to damaged ones (the birds assaulted the new poles).

Says Dr. William C. Bramble, director of the research project, "When you hear one of these birds whacking away at a tree, you'd think it's a man with an axe."

TIP FROM WAITRESS
Detroit — (U.P.) — James Pace, 23, made the mistake of visiting a restaurant the second time. Pace was arrested after a waitress recognized him as the man who had held up the restaurant earlier this week.
