Oregon UN Head Analyzes Question of Sovereignty

How far can the United Nations go toward enforcing world peace, when the sovereignty of nations is involved?

That is the main question facing the United Nations today, according to Dr. Karlin Capper-Johnson, president of the Oregon United Nations association, who spoke to the Medford chapter of the United Nations here Thursday night.

Dr. Capper-Johnson told his listeners that there is no pat answer to the question, but that it must be determined in the light of history, and in the eventual acceptance of the United Nations by the sovereign nations of the world.

The United Nations charter specifically states that the United Nations shall not interfere in the internal affairs of a member nation, the speaker pointed out, and that, he said, brings up the question as to what right the United Nations has to tell France to get out of Algeria, or to tell England to get out of Cyprus, or to take any action whatsoever in events growing out of the colonial troubles of colonial nations.

Quotes President

"President Eisenhower has declared that the United Nations cannot be allowed to fail," Dr. Capper-Johnson stated, "and that brings up the question of what will the United Nations be allowed to do? The United Nations Emergency Force is a small army indeed compared to the armed force of a major nation. Its strength cannot be in armed force. It must be in moral force."

Most people in the United States, the speaker said, were of the opinion that the power of the United Nations would first be applied to Russia, but the first big test of United Nations power was against our traditional allies, France and England. The fact that France, England and Israel withdrew from Egypt at United Nations bidding is proof that moral force can be effective. The UN he said, made no headway in efforts to help settle the Hungarian trouble, because Hungary insisted it was an internal affair, and the Hungarian government even prohibited the United Nations Secretary General from going into Hungary. It is possible, he said, that the United States might face the same problem that Hungary faced, in case the people of Panama should decide to do to the Panama canal what Egypt did to the Suez canal.

"How much of our sovereignty are we willing to give up to enable the United Nations to settle such a dispute for us," Dr. Capper-Johnson asked. "Would we give up any sovereignty, or would we say such a problem is an internal affair, and tell the United Nations to stay out?"

The question of "what is sovereignty?" was also discussed, and Dr. Capper-Johnson said that in recent history, a nation has assumed sovereignty over the ocean three miles from its shores. This, he said is because such a distance was accepted when the old cannon could throw a missile about three miles.

"Now we have atomic war-head guided missiles that can travel across oceans," the speaker said. "Does the old three-mile strip of sovereignty mean anything? Or are we faced with having to take a complete new view at sovereignty? And if so, are the people of the United States, or any other nation, prepared to accept the change?"

"The last thing I want to see is an international government," Dr. Capper-Johnson said, "but where will we draw the line? Is the sovereignty of Egypt more important than the peace of the world? Is the sovereignty of any nation more important than the peace of the world? These questions must be answered. We must be prepared to accept change as the world grows smaller, and destruction more deadly. When we realize that the peace of the world might well balance on the decision of Egypt on the Gaza strip, we realize that there is an important place in our lives for the United Nations."

Dr. Capper-Johnson's talk was followed by a question and answer period in which it was again pointed out that the future of the United Nations is a matter of what the nations of the world make it, and that it cannot be based upon force, but must get its strength from moral persuasion.

"The alternative," Dr. Capper-Johnson said, "is destruction of civilization as we know it, and perhaps the end of the civilized race, if the nations become involved in an atomic or hydrogen war."

George Rode, president of the Medford chapter of the United Nations association, announced that the state UN convention would be held in Medford May 4, and extended an invitation to all persons interested in United Nations activities to attend the meetings during the convention. State UN officers for the coming year will be named during the convention, Rode said.

Camp Fire Observes Anniversary

Camp Fire Girls of the Rogue valley, dressed in their official costumes, will launch the beginning of their organization's forty-seventh Birthday Week (March 17-24) by attending religious services in churches and synagogues this week end.

Religious leaders will pay tribute to Camp Fire Girls for their achievement during the year as they harmoniously worked and played and worshiped together toward fulfilling their national program theme, "Together We Make Tomorrow." They also will commend and encourage Camp Fire Girls in their efforts to live up to the great ideals as expressed in the Law of the Camp Fire Girls: "Worship God. Seek Beauty. Give Service. Pursue Knowledge. Be Trustworthy. Hold on to Health. Glorify Work. Be Happy."

Since March 17, 1910 when Camp Fire's program supplements distinguished educators, Dr. and Mrs. Luther Halsey Gulick, the organization has emphasized and encouraged the spiritual development of each of its members, according to Mrs. Frank Christian, Talent, council president. Camp Fire's program supplements the training given in the home, at the church or synagogue and at school, Mrs. Christian explained.

During Camp Fire's almost half century of serving the leisure-time needs of all girls between the ages of seven and eighteen, it has helped more than 4,000,000 girls to become better homemakers and citizens, she pointed out.

Today over 400,000 girls of all races and religions are enjoying the membership opportunities provided by Camp Fire Girls, Inc., the purpose of which is "to perpetuate the spiritual ideals of the home" and "to stimulate and aid in the formation of habits making for health and character."
