Mid-River Trout Closure Suggested as Method of Improving Rogue Angling

Grants Pass — A revolutionary suggestion to improve angling in the famed Rogue River was advanced by Cole Rivers, resident biologist for the Oregon state game commission, at a meeting of the Rogue Rod and Gun club here last week.
The suggestion is closure of the middle Rogue to all trout fishing to allow passage of steelhead fingerlings downstream to the ocean. Area between Galice and Gold Hill on the river would bear the brunt of such a program.

Ken Hicks, reporting the proposal for the Grants Pass Courier, pointed out that such a plan may draw considerable opposition from Grants Pass and other middle river fishermen. The Grants Pass newsman stated that Rivers, at the meeting, gave a "frank analysis of what is wrong" with Rogue river fishing and what the Oregon game commission is doing to improve angling in this famed stream and its tributaries.

Just Being Studied
Rivers stressed to his listeners that the suggestion is yet in the study stage. He said that there is no cause for immediate concern. Nevertheless, he indicated that the practice of catching these fish on both upstream and downstream migrations must be modified if steelhead and salmon runs, which have made the Rogue, Applegate and Illinois rivers famous, are to be restored.

In telling what is wrong with salmon and steelhead fishing, especially on the middle and upper portions of the river, the biologist presented statistics showing tremendous increase in angling pressure in the past 10 years. While there are three or four times as many anglers in Oregon as there were in 1940, the ratio of increase for the Rogue is eight, nine or even 10 times, according to Rivers.

Angling pressure inevitably has curtailed creel catch of all Rogue anglers, Rivers stated. He said, "Anglers are harvesting an ever-increasing number of steelhead and salmon along the lower river. This is bound to decrease the number of fish available along the middle and upper stretches. . . . With the dividing of the catch among so many persons, many gain the impression that Rogue fishing has gone to pot, Rivers brought out.

Key Stream System
The game commission field man said that, if game officials decide to close the middle Rogue and the Applegate a "key stream system" likely would be put into effect. Certain key streams would be selected for trout fishing and heavily stocked with non-migratory trout. Objective would be good trout fishing and the public would be advised of trout planting dates and areas. Rivers reported that, some consideration was being given to planting "pan fish" or spiny-rayed fish in the middle section of the Rogue to afford angling for children and adult casual fishermen.

Findings indicate these people had a knowledge of mathematics and developed a calendar that the Maya may have borrowed.

Answering criticism of the game commission for not stocking the Rogue more heavily, Rivers gave information showing that more than 10 per cent of commission funds are spent in this area although license fees for the area are less than 10 per cent of the state total.

Turbine screening at Savage Rapids dam should help downstream migration of steelhead fingerlings, according to Rivers. But he voiced doubt that "fishing at both ends" of the river will be advisable much longer if fish runs are to be built up.

Silver Prospects Poor
Rivers mentioned fall, spring and winter steelhead and spring and fall chinook salmon runs. He said that Applegate chinook salmon runs have been increasing in the Applegate but barely holding their own in the Illinois river. Prospects of restoring runs of silver salmon to the middle and upper Rogue are poor, Rivers reported. Small tributaries needed for silvers and sea-run cutthroat to spawn suffered irreparable damage in the scramble for timber in war years, the speaker said. He stated that the game commission still is trying to restore the silver salmon run into the Illinois, Grave creek and other streams of the area.

The game commission is concentrating on salmon and steelhead improvement because the Rogue basin primarily is noted for these runs, Rivers said. He added that the steelhead picture is encouraging to biologists but that a great deal of the improvement program must be devoted to protecting watersheds.
