How to Remove Ink Spots

GRANDMOTHER MAY have been a whiz at removing ink spots with the milk-soaking method, but today's new fabrics and inks call for these more scientific treatments. (The chemicals are available at drugstores.)

New luminescent permanent and washable inks: Rinse the spot with clear water as soon as possible. For washable ink on washable fabric, wash in soapsuds and then, if necessary, soak. Use a commercial detergent on nonwashable material (photo 1). If the spot remains, try warm ethylene glycol or glycerine.

Treat permanent-ink stains with lemon juice (after the preliminary rinse) and rinse again with water (photo 2). If unsuccessful, use the treatment suggested for washable ink, and then repeat the lemon-juice application.

Ball-point inks: Even though these stains are not soluble in water, they can be removed from almost all fabrics except acetate rayon.

Place a pad of clean cotton cloth under the spot, and apply carbon tetrachloride drop by drop, while rubbing gently with a smooth metal or glass object (photo 3). Change the position of the pad frequently, continuing the treatment until no more ink appears on the pad. Next, apply acetone in the same manner until the spot is gone. Dry thoroughly.

Ink stains on skin: Wash with pumice-type soap. Rubbing alcohol or lemon juice helps to remove stubborn stains and spots.

Remember that it's best to treat any kind of ink spot as quickly as possible, pre-testing the method in an inconspicuous place on the garment to make sure it's safe for the fabric. Rinse thoroughly after the treatment to remove chemicals which may harm the cloth.
