Freeze-Drying Research Starts At State College

Corvallis—Storage of ham, pork chops and roasts without refrigeration may be possible in the future as food technologists at Oregon State college investigate a new method of food preservation.

Called freeze-drying, the method differs from conventional drying methods in that the food retains its natural flavor, size and shape after it's dried, and can be quickly reconstituted with water.

OSC research will be aimed at producing a satisfactory dried pre-cooked ham for the armed services. A $14,000 grant was received for the work from the Quartermaster Food and Container Institute.

The armed forces, long interested in practical methods of food preservation for its troops, wants a product that is palatable, yet stable for shipping and storage at far corners of the world. Freeze-dried hams could be reconstituted with hot water and included an army menu, hot and ready-to-eat within minutes.

OSC food technologists will attempt to develop ways to lower the moisture content of the meat to 1 to 4 per cent, study methods of curing and smoking and find ways to package the hams so they can be shipped and stored. In OSC tests, freeze-dried hams would be considered satisfactory products if quality is good after 6 months storage at 100 degrees.

According to Dr. H. W. Schultz, food technology department head, freeze-drying has certain advantages over conventional drying methods. In usual procedures, the surface of the meat hardens and does not reconstitute to natural qualities.

However, in the freeze-drying process, the meat is frozen. As it dries in a vacuum chamber it becomes porous, but it doesn't change much in shape or size. Only the water is removed, leaving the solid parts intact and in place. Because of its porosity, the food when reconstituted takes up water like a sponge.

Beef, pork, chicken, fish, orange juice and certain fruits and vegetables have been successfully dried by this method.
