

INNOVATION SEEMS to be the watchword of America's banks these days. Once rather staid and somber institutions, banks today are going all out to streamline their facilities and services. A few of the more recent changes: drive-in teller windows, left-handed checkbooks, piped-in music, and special windows for the "small-fry" customers.

And now comes banking by television. This latest innovation, introduced recently in New England, employs a closed-circuit television hookup by which the customer, seated in his car, and the teller, in the bank, can see and talk to each other. Underground pneumatic tubes do the job of transferring money and papers back and forth.

Television banking is quick, too. An ordinary deposit or withdrawal takes less than a minute—not counting the primping time of lady customers before they go "on camera."

It may be a while yet before TV-banking becomes widespread, but judging from the way banks are doing these days, it may be sooner than you'd guess.

Banking in the Modern Manner

Closed-circuit TV permits "face-to-face" bank service without leaving your automobile.

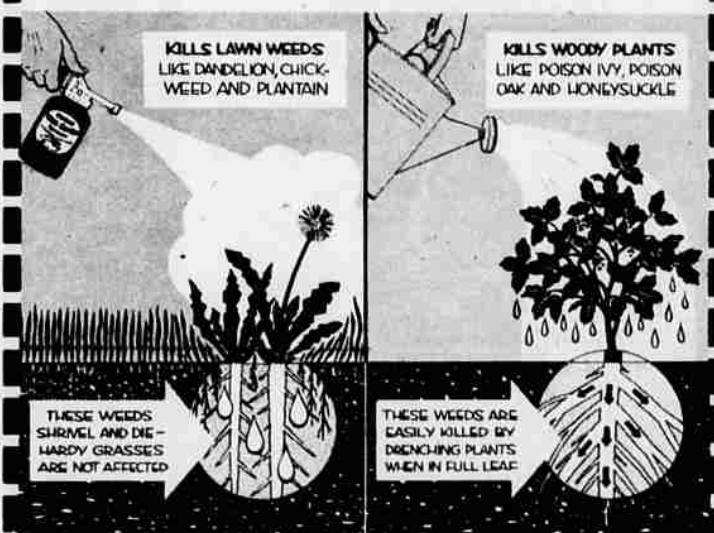

Customer and teller discuss business by two-way radio; pneumatic tubes transfer money.
