Child-Bearing After The Menopause

Women keep asking me when, after the menopause, they can quit worrying about getting pregnant. Looking at statistics, I find that few women ever become pregnant after they have stopped menstruating, say around the age of 50. Some books say that if a woman does conceive after age 45, she is likely to abort or to be delivered of a dead child.

As I happen to be editor of Modern Medicine, a journal that goes to 142,000 physicians twice a month, while I inserted a note asking my readers to tell me if they knew of any cases of pregnancy after the menopause. To show how rare such cases are, Dr. J. Allen Howell, of Wellington, Kan., said that 21 years of practice, during which time he had delivered about 100 women a year, he had not seen a single case. That means not one in 2,100. Dr. J. P. Grehill, of Chicago—an obstetrician with a huge experience—tells me of having delivered one woman 52 years of age, who had apparently gone through the menopause. Dr. G. R. Goering wrote of a woman 53 who had just had her tenth baby. She had stopped menstruating at the age of 48. Dr. Joseph Backler told of a woman who bore a child at the age of 51. She menstruated occasionally for another two years. Dr. J. S. Giardina told of a woman aged 46, who had not menstruated for 26 months, and yet had a normal boy. A year later she had another baby—a girl. Dr. A. F. Smith told of a woman of 52 with a mass in her abdomen who thought she had a tumor because she hadn't menstruated for 12 years. A few months later she was delivered of a healthy child. Dr. P. T. Wilson described an interesting case of a 48-year-old spinster who married a man of 70. Although she had not menstruated for two years, she had a baby girl. Dr. Frank Spielman reported the case of a woman of 50, whose last menstrual period had come nine months before he saw her. At that time she was six months pregnant with her second child in 19 years.

Around Hollywood

By ALINE MOSBY

Hollywood—Actor Cameron Mitchell is recovering from an ulcer operation today but he suffered worse pain, "a hit below the belt," he says, when he heard boxer Barney Ross had turned movie critic.

Mitchell portrayed Ross, an ex-narcotics addict, in a movie about the fighter's life, "Monkey on My Back." The actor's enthusiastic friends raved he should cop an Oscar nomination—but the first reaction was a blast from Barney. In a New York interview, Barney rapped the picture as being "cheap sensationalism." He also filed a suit claiming the ads damaged his reputation.

But Mitchell rallied in an interview himself and delivered Ross a return uppercut. "He was on the set every day of shooting," said Mitchell, talking rapidly with indignation. "Every day he saw the rushes and he'd throw his arms around me, kiss me and say, 'What a fantastic job this picture is doing.'"

Ross was quoted as saying, "This Mitchell is doing such a great job as me I hardly can believe it."

New Trend Cited

"Monkey on My Back" is part of a new trend for pictures about narcotics. It is more daring than "The Man with a Golden Arm," and "A Hatful of Rain." In "Monkey" Mitchell jabs a needle into his arm, a scene once taboo with Hollywood censors. "But Barney coached me for that scene himself," Mitchell said. "He told me how your eyes nearly pop out, how your face gets warm, how there's a tremendous shock."

"He made many suggestions, about the pain in the stomach, the cramps, nausea and kicking of legs. Some things we couldn't use because they were too strong—such as how he used to rip sheets and mattresses apart."
