

Fun in the Pink

IF ANY ANIMAL psychologist has a treatise explaining what makes a flamingo tick, the people at Florida's Sarasota Jungle Gardens would be interested in receiving a copy. The flamingos there—said to be the pinkest in the United States—have been under observation since 1940, but the experts are still stumped.

About the only thing they can say for sure is that flamingos have a strong addiction to follow-the-leader antics. With sheeplike devotion, they play this game most of the time. And the "leader" can be any bird in the flock. When one flamingo goes to sleep, they all sleep; when one bathes, they all jump in; and when a pair starts fighting, they all fight. (Fortunately, the battles are usually sham ones.)

From all this, you might gather that flamingos are dumb birds. They might be. But like a beautiful blonde, they're well worth looking at, just the same.

Flamingos usually hide their black underwings until they feel like sporting a two-tone outfit. Then they gracefully lift their six-foot wingspreads.
