Conflicting rules of the road

from state to state—and even within states—constitute a serious hazard to motorists.

been completed. These rules of the road are backed by the White House Conference on Highway Safety and most other national traffic organizations.

All that is needed now is to put them into general use—a goal that's still a long way off. For while paying lip service to the idea of uniform traffic laws, local agencies go right on compounding the same errors. The one serious argument against uniformity—that "local conditions are different"—has been proved unimportant by communities that have taken the step and reduced accidents.

Other deterrents to uniform traffic laws are public apathy and the tendency of local and state officials to insist that their own judgment prevail over that of experts who have spent many years setting up the model ordinances.

Here is one reform of tremendous public benefit which can be advanced by local civic groups or even by individuals. Copies of the Uniform Vehicle Code and the Model Traffic Ordinances are available for a nominal fee from the National Committee on Uniform Traffic Laws and Ordinances, 1604 K St. N. W., Washington, D. C. State and local officials can hardly ignore the codes, once they have been called to their attention by aroused citizens.

By 1965, the United States is expected to have 80 million cars on the highways—an increase of almost 25 million over the number already crowding our roads today. It's essential to the safety of millions of Americans that something be done long before then to insure uniformity of traffic regulations throughout the country. This may not seem urgent right now. But the next time you're arrested, or narrowly avert an accident away from home for doing something that is legal where you come from, remember the Uniform Vehicle Codes—and let your government officials know about them, too!
