It climbed to about 5000 feet where it blew up to fall seaward (right) in flaming fragments.

Happiness Pills No True Answer To Anxiety, Psychiatrist Claims

By DELOS SMITH
United Press Science Editor
New York.—Some husbands of women who are on their way toward becoming mothers, are nauseated at the sight of breakfast even though their wives may be delighted to see the orange juice and eggs.

Dr. Marc J. Mueser, psychiatrist of Madison, Wis., cited this as a convincing and dramatic example of not only excessive anxiety but of misplaced and highly inappropriate anxiety.

Lecturing a medical audience, he was engaged in an increasingly common psychiatric endeavor these days — trying to convince other and non-psychiatric physicians that happiness pills are no true answer for anxiety.

"Attractive" as they are, they hold anxiety in check, whether it is excessive or normal. They don't cure excessive anxiety. Prolonged and difficult as it is, only psychotherapy can cure excessive anxiety, he said.

Seems on Increase
There's a lot of excessive, misplaced anxiety loose in the land — and it seems to be increasing. It is a situation to which every physician of whatever specialty must face up and deal with effectively.

"Anxiety is, to some extent, a factor in almost every illness and may significantly influence its course and outcome," he continued. "The major feature of all psycho-neurotic disorders, regardless of whether they are manifested physically or as disturbances of bodily function, is excessive and sustained anxiety."

"An increasing amount of evidence exists to indicate that anxiety may play a causative role in a large number of specific diseases, some of which, such as essential hypertension, peptic ulcer, ulcerative colitis, hyperthyroidism and angina pectoris, may be disabling and life-threatening."

That's what physicians must face up to, while keeping in mind that "there is a certain range of anxiety which is an entirely normal reaction to various life-threatening situations, and an essential asset for the protection and survival of the organism."

Has Devastating Effects
"Morbidity anxiety, however, has a much more complex significance. It is a state of excessive, frequently inappropriate, and sustained anxiety which has undesirable and often devastating effects upon the mental and physical health of the individual."

"In the majority of instances, it is the result of an unresolved conflict which arises sometime during a person's life. In some cases, the conflict exists at a conscious level and can be defined by the patient. More often, because of its unpleasant and threatening nature, and the existence of elements not acceptable to the individual's concept of himself, the conflict has been repressed into the unconscious."

Psychotherapy can — though often only after much effort — resolve the conflict, and that is the only cure. Psychiatrists can't handle all this work, and prospective work — there aren't enough psychiatrists. General practitioners and internists must learn to apply psychotherapy — that is their "responsibility" because of "the apparent increase of emotionally induced illnesses."

Berlin.—Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, pledging U.S. support for German reunification in a message marking the fourth anniversary of the East German revolt against Communism:

"The desire of mankind to live in freedom and peace constitutes a force which cannot be resisted. My countrymen and I join with you in honoring the high cause to which you have dedicated this day."

Washington.—Dr. Robert H. Felix, director of the National Institute of Mental Health, criticizing the use of tranquilizer pills for the relief of ordinary tensions and anxieties:

"Anxiety within normal limits is an essential part of normal personality development."

New York.—The city Health Department, advising New Yorkers how to keep cool during a heat wave:

"There are no new or novel ideas for surviving through hot spells in comfort and good health."

Evanston, Ill.—Undersecretary of State Christian A. Herter, warning that abandonment of the U.S. foreign aid program would force underprivileged nations to turn to Russia for aid:

"Should we, by default, abandon these programs, it would not be long before we found the expansion of the Soviet bloc moving at a pace which might well leave us isolated."

Washington.—Republican National Chairman Meade Alcorn, on the split in the Republican party:

"The real division in American politics today is in the Democratic party."

Neuberger Favors Contract at Caves

Washington, D.C.—Senator Richard L. Neuberger of Oregon has informed the chairman of the Senate Interior committee that he has no objections to approval of a contract extending for 15 years the operation of lodging, food and other tourist facilities at Oregon Caves National Monument by the Oregon Caves company.

"Thousands of people every year enjoy this unique National Monument in our state," the Oregon Senator said in a letter to Sen. James E. Murray, committee chairman.

Murray had asked Neuberger for his views on approval of the contract between the company and the National Park Service. Congressional approval is required for contracts granting concessions in national parks and monuments.

Model Plane Endurance Try Ends in Failure

Eugene.—An attempt at the world's record for continuous flight of a model airplane failed Monday.

At 12:28 p.m. the plane, Spirit of Exchange, was forced to land because of motor trouble.

But the three men who are doggedly trying to eclipse the record of 34 hours and 34 minutes were going to try it again, as soon as they could get the plane back in the air.
