

Potpourri

Tomorrow Potpourri and her good friend, Mrs. Paul R. (Teacher Maxine) Smith will board a plane and take off for the east coast. Teacher Maxine has made the trip a number of times before, but for Potpourri it will be a big adventure—the realization of a long-nourished dream and something for which we have saved money ever since daughter graduated and got married.

We're going to visit Washington, D.C., and see a little of what makes the merry-go-round go in that city, then we'll go on to Philadelphia to attend the annual convention of National Education association and last to New York.

All along the way we're going to "tourist" with might and main—the White House and Mt. Vernon, the halls of congress, all the historic sights in Philadelphia, the UN and the UP headquarters in New York, the Shakespearean festival in Stratford, Conn., a Broadway play and visits with daughter and other relatives—all this and more too we're going to do even if we come back home worn to a mere shadow and with a minus-zero bank account. However, the Big Boss and Anna Pellegrini have both warned us against buying the Brooklyn bridge.

Last Sunday Potpourri and pappy climbed into the jeep early in the bright morning and turned the nose of the little car up Anderson Butte. And lucky we did, too, for it was a fine day and the wild flowers were out in all their glory.

Even though the two of us have driven the same roads many times in the past, we could never remember a time when the flowers had been so colorful or in such profusion. At almost every turn the delicate lavender and purple sprays of wild lilac hung gracefully over the side of the road and some slopes looked almost smoky blue, so thick were the blossoming bushes.

We keep promising ourselves to pack a wild flowering kit to take on these excursions, and if we ever find the time, we'll add a little magnifying glass for examining such blossoms as the lilac. In Charles Saunders wild flower book it says that "The little flowers are very interesting if noted closely under a magnifying glass, because of the odd-shaped petals, each with a long claw terminating in an incurving of the blade resembling a hood—or the whole arrangement suggesting a tiny tobacco pipe, to quote Doctor Sudworth."

Pappy took a picture or two to add to our collection and in the same location we also photographed a roadside flower which we had never seen before. About 18 or 20 inches tall, it had a few graceful, curving small branches covered with microscopic blue flowers. The exposed slopes, higher up, were abloom with masses of blue lupine and golden poppies.

We saw more of the beautiful silver thistle than usual with the bright red flowers just beginning to come out. On one bank we found and photographed a lone stalk of either golden broadleaf or golden stars (bloomer) but since they are much alike, we're not sure which it was. In this location we also found a cluster of what resembles the Japanese anemone growing in the yard at home, although a much lower plant, and a little patch of ripe wild strawberries well guarded by poison oak.

Another slope caused us to cry out for pappy to stop quickly, for there were many clumps of the brightest, bluest penstemon imaginable (at least this was our identification). This, too, we had never found in bloom before in Jackson county and the blue is exquisite.

By mid-morning we approached the state forest service lookout at the top of the butte, and were surprised to not only find it inhabited, but to be greeted by name. We learned with pleasure that our neighbors from Happy Valley, Ed and Ida Mae Stone, and Mrs. Stone's father, "Grandpa" Dickinson, are spending their second summer on Anderson lookout, and so we stayed for an hour.

It's easy to understand why the life of a fire lookout appeals to many. The view from Anderson is soul-satisfying. The snow-covered peaks in the Crater lake area are plainly visible and in another direction, one can look over into Josephine county and to the south, the California mountains come into view.

"We never get tired of watching the changing colors and patterns on the mountains," said Mr. S. However, they didn't agree with our thoughts on the profusion of bloom, but declared that flowers seemed to be scarcer in the area of the tower. They also said last year seven or eight deer wandered daily into the little natural meadow below the tower; this year they have seen but two deer so far.

Lynn Ann Latham, touring Mexico with her aunt, Miss Alta Lindsey, began her last letter home by dramatically describing how a storm had added adventure to their stay at Vista Hermosa, a resort hotel converted from an old monastery. With the rain coming down in torrents, the guests made their way to the dining room by a "clammy" path filled with ancient skeletons' only to have the electricity go off during dinner.

Lynn wrote that dinner was served by candlelight and the guests "slushed around" on a wet dance floor and "it was quite a shock when you hit a puddle." Everyone groped their way back to their rooms by the light of Lynn's small flashlight and candles. Electricity and water supplies were still out of commission in the morning, she wrote and "we had a lukewarm breakfast cooked on gas stoves. Vista Hermosa is away out in the boonies far from any town," she concluded. The travelers were en route to Acapulco for a stay before coming home.

Little Jennifer McDade was the star of the party as she stood in the receiving line at the reception which followed the marriage of her aunt Marcia Houghton to Dick Padgham. Jennifer "received" as graciously as Queen Elizabeth greeting her subjects until she looked around and discovered that Papa Elmer McDade was nowhere in sight. Summoned with a lusty wail from Jennifer, Papa Elmer picked up his small daughter who threw her arms around his neck and exclaimed "Daddy, I just never see you any more."

'Mollycoddling' Blamed For Juvenile Troubles

Muskegon, Mich.—An Alvin Karpis, warden of the Southern Michigan prison at Jackson, claims juvenile delinquency is the result of "mollycoddling" by parents.

Bannan said lack of religious training and parental discipline were two reasons why his institution was crowded.

"Treat them (juveniles) like the adults they pretend to be," Bannan said. "We're too mollycoddling with these children of ours."

Retarded Child To Be Subject Of Convention

The first annual convention of the Oregon Association for Retarded Children will be held June 20, in Erb Memorial hall at the University of Oregon in Eugene.

The child at home, government's responsibility toward the retarded child, education's promise to the retarded child, and the retarded child becomes a capable citizen of the community, will be among the various topics presented in the seminar.

Dr. Edgar Doll, consulting psychologist of the Bellingham Public schools in Washington, will be among the many experts to present his ideas and advice to those attending the conference.

All educators and parents interested in the many aspects of helping the retarded child gain a niche in the community and becoming a productive citizen, are urged to attend this conference. Mrs. Robert Minear of the Jackson County Public Health association, stated.

The point of view presented by these experts is that no child need walk in the shadows and each is capable of developing his own traits and aptitudes to the fullest under proper guidance. Mrs. Minear added, however, it is specialized training that is needed in order to help these children, and this conference will help those who wish to aid them, she concluded.

Americans Use 60 Billion Quarts Of Milk Each Year

Chicago—Americans consume approximately 60 billion quarts of milk every year, either as milk or in the form of butter, cheese, ice cream or others of the dairy foods family. It requires the daily efforts of almost 22 million cows on over one million dairy farms to keep this steady river of milk flowing.

Breaking down the milk into its many different food nutrients, needed to maintain healthy bodies, this milk supply provides approximately 30 per cent of the essential elements in the American diet. This includes such things as calcium, phosphorus, vitamins A, D, E, the B vitamins including riboflavin, niacin and other body building elements. Milk protein rates near the top for its biological value.

In return for this 30 per cent of the food nutrients, consumers pay less than 20 cents out of each of their food dollars, putting dairy products into the classification of being bargain foods. It has been estimated that a quart of milk is worth from 38 to 42 cents in terms of buying milk's nutrients in other foods that would commonly be considered substitute sources of the various elements of milk.
