300,000 Homes Needed Annually for Children

By GAY PAULEY United Press Correspondent

New York — Each year approximately 93,000 children are adopted in this country. But another 300,000 need homes.

Carl and Helen Doss, parents of a dozen adopted children, call these 300,000 the "lost" — because they are passed from one unwilling relative to another or placed in private schools, boarded out and forgotten.

"We cannot be smug and say that our present-day haphazard methods and laws of child care are adequate so long as they allow such tragedies to beset the lives of our future citizens," said the couple.

Their estimate of the number of children in need of parents is given in their new book, "If You Adopt a Child." Doss, a Methodist minister, and his wife took into their home 12 children considered "unadoptable" at the time, primarily because of mixed race. The children, according to their parents, have "brought... the greatest of all gifts—love."

Book Tells Of Family They told of their own family in an earlier book.

The Dosses, who live with their brood in Redlands, Calif., call their new work the only complete adoption guide yet to appear. Certainly the two cover the field—from the history of adoption in this country Massachusetts was the first state to permit legal adoption with a law passed in 1851 to advice on where to turn if you want to adopt. "The agency nearest your home."

They believe an adopted child should know his heritage "and he should be told as soon as he is old enough to understand." Close friends and relatives also should know.

"But otherwise," said the couple, "There is no more reason to go around declaring that your child is adopted than there is for you to go around declaring to all and sundry that you are married, a Democrat and member of the Masonic Lodge."

Call For Improvement They called for improvement and uniformity of adoption regulations in the United States and Canada. "Else," they said, "black markets will continue to flourish. With the lack of national laws, there are no ways to stop interstate racketeering of babies and no penalties for engaging in it."

The Agriculture Department said these new patterns "narrow" but measurements.

"These changes," it said, "appear to be in line with the industry's stated reason for making the change — the appearance of a new figure type resulting from the use of modern foundation garments."

A home economist said this official gobbledegook merely means that while uplift brassieres have been expanding bosom sizes, modern girdles have been bringing hip measurements under better control.

Dress Patterns Not Full Enough Authorities Say

By BERNARD BRENNER United Press Correspondent

Washington — The average American girl is one inch bustier than most dress patterns give her credit for, government authorities said today.

"It's a confused situation," an Agriculture Department home economist sighed.

Most dress pattern manufacturers began using a new set of size measurements a year ago. The new patterns increased bust measurements one to two inches but they still are generally an inch short of the standard recommended by the government.

In a "misses" size 16, for example, the bust size was increased from 34 to 36 inches in the new patterns. But the government's "commercial standard" recommends a 37-inch allowance for a size 16.

In many sizes, federal bosom standards are a good three inches beyond the point from which pattern makers expanded one year ago.

"I don't exactly know why," the home economist said. "I guess it's a combination of growth and better uplift brassieres."

"Sizing has changed because of the uplift brassiere," she said. The actual measurements on which the government standards are based were made by Agriculture Department research workers in 1939 and 1940. Federal statistical experts have assured any new mass measurement of the American female figure probably would not show any significant changes in the most popular dress sizes.

Major mail order houses adopted federal bosom measurements for their garments about four years ago. But they found last year's changes too great to make in a single jump.

The Agriculture Department said these new patterns "narrow" but measurements.

"These changes," it said, "appear to be in line with the industry's stated reason for making the change — the appearance of a new figure type resulting from the use of modern foundation garments."

A home economist said this official gobbledegook merely means that while uplift brassieres have been expanding bosom sizes, modern girdles have been bringing hip measurements under better control.

Packed Stadium Seen by Graham

New York — Billy Graham said Monday night he was confident his New York Crusade would pack Yankee Stadium July 20 despite the fact "some of the smart boys are giving 10-1 odds against it."

The 38-year-old evangelist told a Madison Square Garden audience of 18,300 that he would definitely end his crusade July 20 with a mammoth meeting in Yankee Stadium, which seats 67,000 persons.

I have confidence that the Christian people of New York will come there and bring their unburchurded friends," Graham said. He said he had heard that "the smart boys around town" were betting against him, but it didn't worry him.

Cowboy star Roy Rogers and his wife, Dale Evans, will appear at some of Graham's meetings over the long July 4th week end, the evangelist announced.

Roger Hull, chairman of the New York Crusade executive committee, said Graham will appear on two additional nationwide telecasts that will originate from Madison Square Garden July 6 and 13. The Yankee Stadium meeting will not be televised.
