Church Council Calls on Labor in Annual Message

New York — The National Council of Churches urged today that organized labor help solve the great problems of an era in which there is "an economy of abundance."

The council issued its 40th annual "Labor Day" message, designed to be read from church pulpits to the 144,000 congregations of the 30 major Protestant and Eastern Orthodox church bodies which are council members.

"Labor can make a unique and necessary contribution in the quest for solutions to the problems which this era poses for all of us as individuals, as groups, and as a nation," the council said. It listed as unsolved problems:

—How man can develop in his daily work "a deeper feeling of vocation and participation" in the nation's economic enterprise.

—How to make social, educational and other services and facilities generally available without discrimination.

—How to meet social maladies such as unemployment, slums and delinquency.

—How the American economy can make the greatest contribution to peoples throughout the world.

—How to avoid extreme inflation and deflations while maintaining growth and abundance.

"These paramount needs of our national life demand the sharpening of conscience and the dedication of effort on the part of all our people," the council said.

"We can meet them only with the while-hearted cooperation of labor, along with other groups."

"Such cooperation our churches are bound to encourage and promote."
