Task of Writing Brokerage Letter Most Uninspiring

By ELMER C. WALZER
United Press Financial Editor

New York—According to some of the analysts there's nothing so uninspiring right now as the job of writing a brokerage letter. With market psychology deteriorating and a similar tendency becoming apparent among business people there isn't much definite that one can find to write about, the brokerage experts complain.

One of them notes that to suggest reasons for this irregularity is like warming up the remains of Sunday's meal.

Old Reasons Meaningless

The old reasons are there and they have been heard so often that they are meaningless to the trading community.

There are some who hold that this is a bear market but the majority of market men insist that it's still in the bull stage and hasn't gone through the proper bull market funeral.

Bulls don't die easily, but they get mighty sick.

One market man points out that it's difficult to worry over a bear market when so many issues have had their own private bear markets so long.

This market ought to rally from this point, say the experts, but actually they aren't certain it will. Hence the difficulty of making predictions in the market letters.

Brokers have lots of orders to sell stocks above the market at this level and hence they don't think rallies will get too far.

Some of them believe the market will be depressed further, possibly toward the 400 mark, possibly stopping around 425.

What the market men who write the market letters would like to know are how the small speculators will behave if prices go down much further. Also they'd like to know how the institutions will act when they're able to buy stocks at discounts. Also the letter writers wonder why, if there's so much bearishness around, more people don't sell this market short. They have plenty of opportunity to do so on small advances that occur from time to time. Short sales must be made on an uptick.

They aren't surprised at the early start in tax selling and they look for a lot more in view

Albany Youth Dies In Naval Hospital

He was rushed to the naval hospital here.

He is survived by his mother, Mrs. Gladys L. Hoffman of Albany.
