Help Yourself to Happiness Smartest In School

This column is one of a series on marriage and family problems which appears weekly in this paper. It presents problems on everyday living and attempts to bring you the most expert opinion in this area. Readers are invited to present their problems. All queries will receive individual attention and should be accompanied by a stamped self-addressed envelope directed to Mary Harris Seifert, M.A., Department of Education, The American Institute of Family Relations, 5251 Sunset Boulevard, Los Angeles 27, California.

"Dear Mrs. Seifert: The rebellion and antagonism of our 14 year old son is upsetting our home and driving my husband and me to distraction. Any suggestions we make about clothing or manners, any rules we lay down about behavior or work are all met with defiance. Bobby seems to go out of his way to do the opposite of what we wish, no matter how careful we try to be. He actually seems to hate us at times. Are all teen agers so hard to manage—and what do parents do about them?"

"From Two Distracted Parents." The average adolescent lives in a confused world between childhood and adulthood. He is neither a child to be given unlimited freedom, nor an adult to be entrusted with unlimited responsibility. He is neither fish nor fowl, yet a bit of both. He resents the remnants of his baby dependence, yet part of him clings to this security, reluctant to give it up. Still another part of him wants desperately to be a MAN, preferably nine feet tall, free to make and break decisions, respected, admired, feared. He needs his parents, yet he resents them—all in the same surge of emotion. The apparent strength of his occasional seeming hatred often tends to show the strength of his dependence and his need for security. His "no" often means "yes," and his resentment is frequently the outward covering of fear.

The average parents are usually, both dismayed and outraged by their teenager's rebellion. They may be so shocked by his outbursts that they do not see that he has problems of his own age, which must be met with understanding, sympathy, and firmness. A teenager in rebellion is a hard being to live with, and a distracted parent is not always calm and impersonal enough to pass judgments which are dispassionate and kindly.

About the best way for parents to meet the problem is to adopt, lovingly, a rather hard-boiled attitude. Be as understanding as you can—be sure that your requests, suggestions, and rules are fair—then be firm. Protect yourself against his antagonism with the knowledge that this is a stage of growth through which Bobby will most certainly pass, that he will survive—and so will you! Let him know that you love him—and give him room to grow!
