No Special Danger From Japanese Toys

Washington — There is no special danger to children from paint on Japanese-made or other foreign toys, according to U.S. Surgeon General Leroy E. Burney.

Burney issued a statement Tuesday night saying tests by the U.S. Public Health Service and state and city laboratories reveal "no significant difference between domestic and foreign toys in the matter of lead content of paint."

The statement was made in reply to reports that paint used on Japanese toys sold in retail stores in the United States could give children lead poisoning.

Burney said Public Health Service study was made with the aid of a group of consultants "who are experts in lead poisoning."

Handicapped Veteran at Camp White Rehabilitated; Becomes Full-Time Cook

Edward J. Barton, 44-year-old World War II veteran now residing at the Veterans Administration domiciliary at Camp White, is a good example of what can be done through vocational rehabilitation of a handicapped person.

National Employ the Handicapped week is being observed through this week and the Jackson county committee is stepping up its program to encourage employers to find a place for handicapped workers.

Barton sustained a back injury while in the service, resulting in a left sciatic neuritis. He had a spinal fusion and on admittance to the Camp White domiciliary was unable to follow his occupation as a cook, according to VA officials.

After several interviews he was assigned to light activity in the veterans' canteen. Intermittent periods of back pain interfered with his work, officials said, but by March, 1956, he had developed sufficient to consider him for a job as full time cook.

He was allowed to assume duties in the kitchen, working whenever his back condition would allow. Together with medical treatment, kitchen duties and long walks, Barton's back developed to the point to where he was able to take on full-time kitchen duties under Civil Service. He also has kept his interest in the canteen, officials said, and from time to time has come up with ideas for improvement in that department.

Experience with his own disability has made him a logical teacher of other veterans with cooking backgrounds and he has assisted several toward rehabilitation, domiciliary officials said.
