Halt May Be Called In Salmon Fishing

Biological consultant for California-Oregon Power company Charles J. Hanel expressed the belief that Oregon will soon be forced to close Salmon fishing if continued low runs are recorded next year. He gave this prediction before a meeting of the Jackson County chamber of commerce roundtable on Monday noon.

Hanel said Washington has closed salmon fishing during the later part of the season this year in order to allow a sufficient spawning run. Oregon will be forced with the same problem next year if no improvement is noted, he said.

Hanel's job with COPCO is to be coordinator between the state game commission and the company when construction is planned which will block a fish migratory route. He said a number of COPCO's power installation are far enough upstream so no damage results to the routes.

He said fishing has been improved in most cases because of the creation of large lakes behind dams which are ideal for fish life. All lakes now planted with fish have been surveyed
