Protection for Alcoholic From Dangers Harmful

Berkeley, Calif.—A psychiatrist believes that relatives and friends who protect an alcoholic from the consequences of his drinking are actually doing him more harm than good.

Dr. Fredrick Lemere, clinical professor of psychiatry at the University of Washington School of Medicine in Seattle, expressed this belief in a talk before the North American Association of Alcoholism Programs.

"The well-meaning efforts of friends or relatives to protect an alcoholic from the consequences of his drinking may actually be a disservice to the patient," Lemere said.

May Postpone Treatment

"Shielding the patient may only postpone treatment beyond the point at which it can do him any good."

Based on his experience with more than 8,000 patients treated at the Shadel Hospital in Seattle, Lemere said few patients would have tried to quit drinking "had not some sort of pressure been put on them to give up the habit."

The most common sort of pressure, he said, was a threatened loss of a job, threat of divorce or deteriorating health.

Lemere said if an alcoholic rejects efforts to help him, he should not be contacted again for at least six months.

Should Have Assurance

"Too frequent efforts to get an alcoholic to do something about his drinking are interpreted only as nagging and defeat their own purpose," he said. "He should be left with the assurance, however, that help will be forthcoming at any time should he request it."

The attitude of the therapist or counselor must be a "genuine one of friendly assistance," Lemere said.

"Although one may legitimately and advantageously hate alcoholism as a social evil, he must never consciously or unconsciously, hate the alcoholic as a person if he is going to help him."

"Unlimited patients and a high tolerance to frustration is required of anyone trying to help alcoholics."
