'Don't Follow Crowd,' Investment Report Warns Little Man

United Press Financial Editor

New York —UP— The little man in Wall Street is wooed and won over to buying stocks when things look good and then jumped on, criticized, and generally maligned when he becomes frightened enough to sell.

Elmer Walzer

The experts at times like these warn against following the crowd. The firm of Arthur Wiesenberger devotes the leading section of its current investment report to just that advice.

It observes that the mentality of the crowd is that of its lowest and notes that "when a crowd forms and functions, its motives and acts are almost solely a reflection of emotional rather than intellectual stimuli."

Functioning of the crowd, the firm points out, is why stock prices at bull market peaks as well as bear market bottoms "make no sense." This is why markets "overshoot the marks"—sell "too high" at tops and "too low" at bottoms.

Stimulated Three Times

Crowds are stimulated to action three times and usually no more, the firm notes. This, it adds, finds expression in the stock market in triple tops, triple bottoms, three steps up, three steps down. It is explained by the fact that after the third advance few buyers are left, and after the third decline, few sellers remain.

Hence three tops in the bull market around 524—April 1956, August 1956, and July 1957. Selling that has followed the high set on July 12 is seen as the first step, "likely to be followed by two more."

The Wiesenberger firm believes the next one might break 400 and the third go somewhat deeper, "but only events, the turn of the news and its effect upon the crowd of investors will determine how low this market may go. It certainly will not be the result of a group sitting down with pencils and figuring out where the stocks should sell on the basis of earnings and dividends."

Typical Retracement

Another reflection of crowd feelings and emotion is cited as the typical retracement by the market of simple fractions of previous moves. It fell one-fourth of the 432-point rise from the low of 92 in April, 1942, to the peak of 524 and then retraced one-fourth of the 108 point decline by rallying 27 points, from 416 to 443.

The firm warns against buying on the market's first go-down and adds that when and as the market has its next sell-off, especially if it breaks 400, there "probably will be a number of interesting and attractive purchases."

Sounds simple. It works out like this, says the Wiesenberger firm: "Successful investing results from a proper mixture of courage and caution — the courage to act at the right time and the caution to appreciate the risks in any situation."

It would seem that a study of crowd psychology rather than market operations would do the trick for the successful stock trader.
