The Doc Rolls Up His Sleeves

As You Were Saying...

RECENTLY MY little children and I reluctantly took our cat to the animal clinic. She was going to have kittens and was having a hard time.

After hearing the examining veterinarian, I regretfully told him to put her to sleep if she couldn't pull through. We couldn't afford a costly operation.

Two tense days followed. When I called the vet, he said, "She had one kitten yesterday but couldn't nurse it. I couldn't stand it anymore. I thought about those kids, so I rolled up my sleeves and operated on my own. The cat's fine now, so are the kittens."

He'll never know how grateful my children were. As for me, his gentle, generous act put a lovely new color on the world. —Mrs. Horace Daughenbaugh, Rapid City, S.D.

Our Son Teaches Us Manners. I was expecting house guests so, along with other preparations, I drilled my son on the importance of being especially courteous.

The visit went wonderfully. Everyone outdid himself in being hospitable and agreeable. I mentioned it at dinner next day and said we should have company more often.

"Yeah, why don't we?" my son asked. "Even you and Dad had 'company manners.' Nobody was yelling at me or telling me what to do."

It never occurred to me before, but I guess parents need occasional reminding about their manners, too. —Mrs. Irene Hipp Wenning, Mansfield, Ohio.

I Was Just Thinking...

"... WHO ARE YOU?"

The pretty girl smiled as she saw the startled eyes around the table.

"Don't think about an answer," she went on. "Just tell me three things."

"Is it a gag?" asked the man across the table. "Okay. I'm a rat, a bum, and an aristocrat."

All of us laughed. The pretty girl smiled.

"I guess it's a kind of game," she said. "But take it seriously."

"I'm George Holmes. I'm a husband. I'm a doctor."

She smiled proudly at him. She was his wife.

"That's pretty good," she said. "Actually, you ought to begin with that approach. You ought to take pride in your name and what you do."

She turned to me.

"I had been going to say, I'm a woman. I'm a writer," I said. "I hadn't thought of using my name. And I don't know why I put 'woman' ahead of 'writer.'"

She approved.

"That's good. It's better to be a woman first and something else second."

A silence fell. The rolls cooled and the steam left the coffee. The pretty girl waited. Then she sighed a little.

"I had hoped someone would begin at the real beginning, but I guess it was too much to hope for. Still, it's the one identification without which the rest of them can't exist."

We looked at one another blankly.

"Don't you know? Why is it none of you said, 'I am a child of God?'"

Our eyes smiled at each other and at her. But we were a little ashamed.
