

form more than 1,000 experiments with bell, buzzer, and lights on a control board. And for the budding woodworker, there are tool chests including battery-driven drills that will drive, mix, buff, and polish with complete safety.

Santa even teaches driving safety this year. In his pack there's a driving panel with gear shift and steering wheel which improves the coordination of tomorrow's motorists. Another manufacturer features a toy traffic signal.

Then there's electronics. Toy designer Marvin Glass has introduced a teletyper that sends messages from one toy machine to be typed out on another elsewhere in the house. Glass also designed a remote-control robot claw that picks up things and drops them in a toy dump truck.

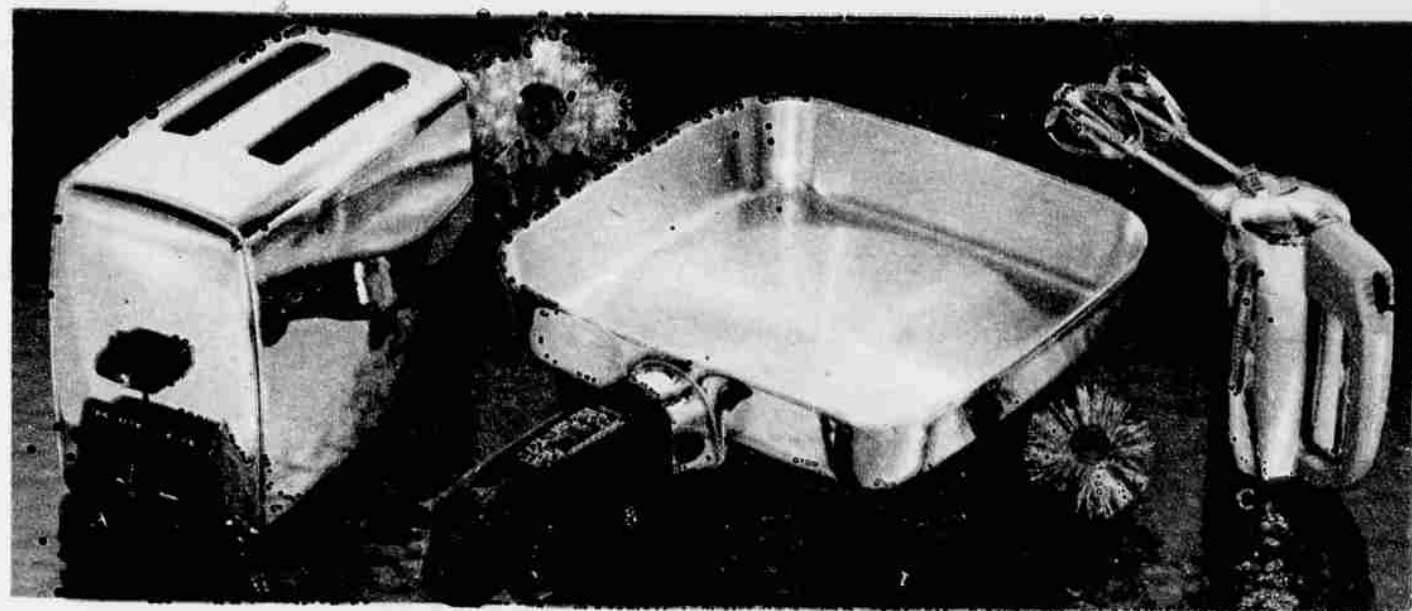

All is not stark realism, however. In the push-and-pull category, there's a train with black-board panels as boxcar sides; ingenious corn poppers, snap-lock beads, and giant lightweight blocks that fit together and permit toddlers to stand on them.

All in all, more than a billion dollars' worth of toys are on their way—to be closely followed by a zillion happy little faces!

Toys!

Traffic-signal toy teaches child stop-and-go lights. Like other take-it-apart toys, it features multicolored individual pieces.
