Heavy Illinois Rains Force 30 Families To Abandon Residences

By UNITED PRESS
Fresh rains today threatened to pelt water-logged southern Illinois where heavy rainfalls already forced 40 families to abandon their homes in the path of flooded waterways.

A small corps of trucks and motorboats carried families encamped on the banks of the Little Wabash river in southeastern Illinois to safety Thursday and early today. Fed by heavy rains which followed recent off-season tornadoes into the area, the river was expected to crest at 34 feet today.

Livestock Endangered
Authorities said the biggest difficulty confronting the evacuees was getting their livestock to safety. Farther north on the Little Wabash, only three families were forced to leave their homes by minor flooding.

Meanwhile, at Murphysboro, hardest hit by the late December tornadoes, the Big Muddy river dropped another four inches. No families were forced to evacuate the area.

In the rest of the nation, a late coming winter began to show first signs of digging in. Cool air moved in behind a disturbance in the Northeast Thursday night, causing lower temperatures over the entire nation from the Mississippi Valley to the Atlantic Seaboard.

Northwest Relieved
The Pacific Northwest, pelted repeatedly the past few weeks by scattered showers and snow flurries, got a slight reprieve Thursday but the Weather Bureau said a new Pacific storm was moving into the area.

More rain was forecast from Northern California to Washington and some snow flurries were seen inland over higher elevations.
