ICBM's Arrive At Test Center

San Diego, Calif. — Two new Atlas intercontinental ballistic missiles have arrived at Cape Canaveral, Fla., test center and are ready for testing, according to a copyrighted story by the San Diego Union.

The newspaper said the two 80-foot missiles left the Convair Astronautics plant here a week ago, just three days after the first successful test of an Atlas ICBM at Cape Canaveral on Dec. 17. The firing followed two earlier missiles which were destroyed in flight when they wobbled off course.

The union said the twin shipment could be an indication that the big missiles have entered the production line phase of their development or are near assembly line production. It said at least one other Atlas missile was believed to be at the test center before arrival of the San Diego shipment.

A fourth Atlas scheduled for firing soon after the Dec. 17 test was damaged during rocket engine checks and won't be fired until next year, according to the newspaper.

Heart Catholic church at 8 p.m. today with services scheduled Monday, Dec. 30, at 9 a.m., the Rev. John McLead, officiating. Interment will be in the Jacksonville cemetery. Litwiller's Funeral home, Ashland, is in charge of arrangements.
