Unsaturated Fats Reduce Level Of Cholesterol, Tests Reveal

By DELOS SMITH
United Press Science Editor
New York—Prolonged experiments with what human body chemistry does to fats in the diet have proved that unsaturated fats reduce the level of cholesterol in the blood serum whereas the saturated fats increase the level.

This had been indicated in previous experiments but a margin of doubt remained because experimental times were relatively short and there was no clear demonstration of what happened to the cholesterol which seemed to disappear.
The new, prolonged experiments showed that unsaturated fats in the diet remove cholesterol permanently from the body chemistry—by eliminating it from the body. The implication of that is that a "fat-free" diet is not a must in lowering blood cholesterol levels.

"The beneficial effect of a low serum cholesterol level on the development and regression of atherosclerosis (hardening of the arteries) remains to be proved. At this stage, therefore, radical changes in modern dietetic practices should not be advocated except for the purpose of controlled investigation," he said in reporting to the technical journal, "The Lancet."

Gordon's experiments in human body chemistry and fats at the university of Cape Town (South Africa) have given him a world reputation in the field. His newest research setup was designed to extend and verify experimental findings of other workers, especially in the United States and Great Britain.
Everything Analyzed
His 10 men were confined in a "metabolic" laboratory which is a place where everything which goes into body chemistry and everything which is eliminated from it, are precisely analyzed—with frequent blood and other tests to find out what is happening chemically meanwhile.

The results gave an emphatic underscoring to the growing conviction of body chemists—the quality of fats in the diet are just as important as their quantity so far as the blood serum cholesterol level is concerned. Gordon made another emphatic point. Regardless of the diet, body chemistry "makes" cholesterol. "The effects of different fats" on this making, he said, "remains to be explored in man."
