Ocean Vessels At Twice Speed Of Sound Seen

Portland —(AP)— Chairman Clarence G. Morse of the Federal Maritime Board raised the possibility Wednesday that ocean-going ships may some day travel at twice the speed of sound.

"Why shouldn't we break the sound barrier" on the ocean? Morse asked in a speech to the Propeller Club here.

"Why should we continue to think in terms of 30-35 knots? Why shouldn't we think in terms of mach II, or beter, at sea?"

Mach II is twice the speed of sound, or about 1,520 miles an hour on the surface of the earth.

Closer Look Planned

Morse said the government already intends to "take a closer look at the possibilities of hydrofoils for larger ships."

Hydrofoils are relatively small thin platforms built on legs beneath a boat's surface. As the boat picks up speed its body rises out of the water and it travels on the hydrofoils reduces water drag and permits greater speed.

Morse also said the government has "decided to enter into a study contract with private industry" on the possibility of developing a submarine tanker.

He said the study will decide what the underwater tanker" will look like, what will be its speed, size, performance and efficiency, what it can accomplish, what are its economics."
