Experiment on Columbia May Eliminate Ladders

New York — An experiment conducted on the Columbia river by the Corps of Engineers may be the beginning of the end for expensive and extensive fish ladders over extremely high dams, reports Engineering News-Record, McGraw-Hill publication.

The Corps last summer, built an artificial salmon spawning pool downstream of chinook salmon. The hope is that instead of having spawning salmon and resulting fingerlings make their way past dams, they can be made to spawn and hatch in grounds that would be provided down stream of the dams.

Proves Successful

The first phase has proved successful. The salmon have paired off and laid their eggs.

The question now is: Will these eggs mature and hatch this next Spring?

If they do, and if the four-year cycle is completed by the new salmon returning to spawn in the artificial channel, then the possibility of excluding provisions for passage of fish in future dams could be considered.

The artificial pool essentially is a 20-foot wide channel divided into three independent 300-yard long strecches of water separated by screening devices. The three sections contain the same bottom conditions such as would be found in various stretches of the upper Columbia and lower Snake rivers.

There already is some evidence that the artificial spawning grounds will be a success. A large recreational swimming area created by the Oregon State Park board, has been sought out and used for spawning by stray chinook. And this Fall, the four-year cycle was completed by returnings almon. However, "strays" will tend to explore. It will take the controlled experiment now under way to make a firm statement about artificial spawning grounds.

JURY PROBES CRIME

New York —(UP)— A grand jury investigating crime in Brooklyn schools Wednesday renewed its demands that policemen patrol city schools to cut down on what it called a "crime wave." The jury's demand resulted from the reported rape of a 12-year-old girl by a ninth-grade student in the John Marshall Junior High school Tuesday. It was the jury's third presentment on the subject of putting police in schools.
