MEDFORD (OREGON) MAIL TRIBUNE—SEVEN

Scientists Find Six Factors Making Up Sex of Individuals

By DELOS SMITH
United Press Science Editor
New York — Scientific efforts to understand the full meanings of sex have now reached the point where a scientist can rightly say whenever the sex of an individual is specified what sex do you mean?
Science has shown that any individual has (1) genetic sex; (2) gonadal sex; (3) anatomical sex; (4) hormonal sex; (5) social sex, and (6) psychological sex. Fortunately, in most all individuals all these "sexes" agree and the individual is indubitably male or female.

Exceptions Stimulating
But there are exceptions, and these exceptions are stimulating scientific thought and investigation. As the international technical journal, "The Lancet," points out: "Results at any sex level may be equivocal; and when unequivocal they may disagree with equal-" ly unequivocal results at any other level."

The case in point in current scientific discussion is that of an infant taken to Drs. J. B. Ashley and C. H. Jones of Liverpool at the age of 10 days because of "doubts about the true sex." The doctors have reported their bewilderingly both at a science meeting and to "The Lancet."

Some Doubts Arose
The doubts arose from an anomaly at the gonadal sex level which turned out to be quite minor. In hormonal and anatomical sexes, examination proved that the infant was most definitely female. Social and psychological sexes are not measurable in infants, of course.

But in genetic sex, this infant was as definitely male. Here it must be explained that the identification of genetic sex is a rather recent triumph of science. It has been shown that the nuclei of female body cells contain "drumsticks" not found in male cells. Genetic sex is the sex determined in the union of the chromosomes of the male and female germ cells.

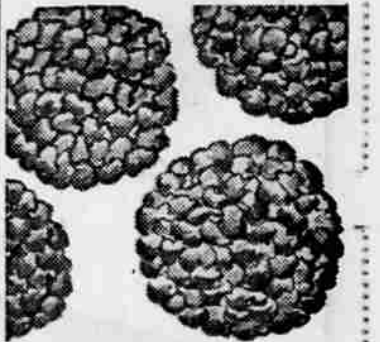

The infant is of scientific interest because science can now determine the genetic sex of individuals. But there is no further knowledge the infant can provide science until she grows up. The doctors remarked: "It will be interesting to see whether this child attains a normal stature and has a normal puberty."

OSC To Intensify Nuclear Science

Corvallis — Teaching programs in nuclear science and engineering will be expanded and intensified next year at Oregon State college with a $165,900 grant to be used for purchase of a small, training nuclear reactor.

Oregon State was one of seven colleges in the nation to be given grants by the Atomic Energy Commission for purchase of the training reactors.

The reactor, first in Oregon, gets its name from the "chain reactions" that come from the uranium-235 used as fuel. These reactions produce atomic energy and can be sustained under controlled conditions. The "low-power" reactor is especially designed for training of students in the nuclear fields, George W. Gleason, dean of engineering, said.

Housing Trends Topic at Meeting

James L. Payne, Medford architect, discussed housing trends at a recent meeting of the Medford Multiple Listing service here.

He said the next 10 years promise a heavy growth in residential building in this area with a tendency toward smaller living space and household items highly functional. Outdoor living and yard facilities will be emphasized, he added.

Payne noted a trend toward lower roofs, more use of glass, and a demand for more effective heating systems. He urged realtors and builders to direct their efforts toward the income class most frequently seeking homes.

Martin R. Barnett Realty was accepted by the service as a new member at the meeting.
