Family Council

Newton J.—I'm a model kid.

Mrs. L. J.—Barbara has too much influence over him.

Newton J.—I can't figure out what's wrong with my parents. They don't know a good thing when they have it—namely me.

I don't want to brag, but I have to say it. I am really a model kid. I'm 17 and I've never given my folks any trouble. I've always done well in school, I get along with everyone and I'm quite cooperative at home. Even my mother has to admit that I'm neat and I never throw things around.

What have they got against me? Only this. I'm going steady with a real nice girl. They admit she's nice, but they complain that she has too much influence over me. Now if she were a bad influence, I could understand, but she happens to be a really swell girl. She makes me save my money. She tells me to study harder and to go out for school awards. What can be wrong with that?

Mrs. L. J.—Most of what Newton says is true. He is really a good kid. His girl isn't a bad sort, either, but we do feel that she has entirely too much influence over Newton.

I heard Barbara bawling Newton out one day about not having done his algebra homework and I was really shocked. She gave it to him good and proper. What was worse was the way Newton took it. He acted like a little boy who knew he deserved a spanking.

That's not too bad, I suppose. It was all in a good cause. But Barbara has just as much control in other ways. Newton had picked a particular college that emphasized engineering. Barbara decided that engineering was not a good career for him. She made him change his mind about his vocation and has picked two other colleges for him to apply to. He didn't even consult us about this.

The Council—Researchers tell us that this is a common current problem. Young men who date steady tend to fall right out of Mama's arms into the arms of a young lady fully prepared to become his manager.

It does not seem to be a very happy situation. The young men enjoy the security of having a steady girl and of being cared for, but this early domestication must take its toll. The boy never learns independence, nor the joy of finding his power and range in thought and feeling. The girl is similarly tied down by her role of mother-substitute and general boss. Both are likely to feel rather bitter about lost opportunities in later years.

The only way we can see out of this situation is for the L. J.'s to explain to Newton that they are less interested in his being a "model kid" than they are in seeing him discover his own individuality and potentiality. They should show him that they can take minor slip-ups and misbehavior on his part in stride, but they take a very dim view of perfect behavior under a dictatorship.

It will not do to oppose Barbara's edicts on general principle. These parents should, instead, insist that Newton investigate different possibilities before arriving at a decision on any matter. (Copyright 1958, General Features Corp.)
