

Decisions Topic Involves Dealing With Russia

DEALING WITH RUSSIA—The above map shows Russia, and briefly shows its potential as an industrial and agricultural nation. This week's Great Decisions subject concerns how the free nations, and especially the United States, can deal with Russia for a lasting peace. The map was prepared by the Foreign Policy Association, which also prepares and is one of the sponsors of the eight-week Great Decisions program.

Negotiating Cold War Settlement Among 1st Items

(Editor's note: This is the first in a series of eight articles discussing topics in this year's Great Decisions program. Material is furnished by the Foreign Policy Association, New York. This week's subject is Can We Deal With Russia?)

As responsible people point out, the United States is already "dealing" with Russia and has been for years. We carry on day to day diplomatic and commercial business with the Soviets through our (and their) embassies and consulates. We work with them in the UN. We exchange correspondence at top levels of government.

The great debate of the moment is, How can we deal most effectively with Russia? Can we negotiate a settlement of any hard issues of the cold war? Can we gain anything from new negotiations?

"How?" is perhaps the first and most important question. The Kremlin wants another conference "at the summit," with heads of government participating. The White House and other Western capitals are reluctant to go to the "summit" unless progress can be made first at lower, diplomatic levels.

Two plane have recently been offered to break the German log jam. One originated (although it is not entirely new) with George F. Kennan, former U.S. ambassador to Moscow. The other originated with Polish Foreign Minister Adam Rapacki.

Kennan Proposal
The Kennan proposal, offered on Nov. 24, calls for the withdrawal of both Western and Soviet troops from both parts of Germany. Such a step, according to Kennan, might accomplish several desirable results—geographical separation of the military forces of the "nuclear" powers, paving the way to German reunification, creating an opportunity for greater independence in the rest of satellite Europe.

Rapacki Plan
The Rapacki plan also calls for a "thinning out" of military power in Central Europe. The Polish leader called in early December for a ban on nuclear weapons in East and West Germany, Poland and Czechoslovakia. Soviet Premier Nikolai A. Bulganin took up the proposal in his series of letters to heads of government during December and January.

Both the Kennan and Rapacki proposals created wide interest and debate in Western European circles. In West Germany Kennan's ideas found a sympathetic hearing, particularly among members of the major opposition party, the Social Democrats, who have long entertained the possibility of a "neutralized" united Germany.

Strongly Criticized
In the U.S., however, Kennan was strongly criticized by his two former bosses, Harry S. Truman and former Secretary of State Dean Acheson. Accusing Kennan of not grasping "the realities of power relationships," Acheson warned that a removal of American forces from the continent would leave Soviet power unopposed in Western and Eastern Europe alike and free to undermine the independence of the free nations of Europe.

President Eisenhower, meanwhile, reacted skeptically to the Polish plan in his reply to Premier Bulganin of Jan. 12. "There cannot be great significance," he wrote, "in denouncing a small area when, as you say, 'the range of modern types of weapons does not know any geographical limit' . . . Furthermore, your proposal in Germany is in no way related to the ending of the division of that country but would, in fact, tend to perpetuate that division."

To some observers, however, the two proposals suggest that there may be room for negotiation on the 13-year-old German deadlock. But no one has suggested that agreement will be easy.

Professor Calls for Reevaluating Attitudes

Reevaluation of attitudes toward methods of instruction was suggested by Dr. Floyd Pennington, professor of chemistry at Southern Oregon college, at a meeting of Crater Lions club last week.

Dr. Pennington spoke on the "Russian Challenge to American Science Education". He told the group that American colleges and universities are graduating more men and women but Russia is graduating more science and engineering students.

The Russia methods of teaching are similar to methods used in the United States several decades ago, he said. He explained to the group how Russia uses a rigid course of study and a strict discipline to force students to perform up to their best ability.

Should Improve Status
America should improve the status of scientists as a first step in improving science education, he said. He told the group America needs to increase basic research on the state, college and industrial levels. He also told of better facilities needed for classroom teaching of science.

Pennington said the American system of education does not need to educate everyone to the top level but said use should be made of skilled technicians. He also stressed the need for stronger requirements for science teachers.

He said Americans now spend the same amount of money on tobacco and alcoholic beverages as on education each year. He noted spending the same money on improving education would have a much better benefit to the country.

Camp Fire Girls

Horizon Club

The Rogue River Horizon club includes former members of Camp Fire groups in Medford and Eagle Point.

Driver's Action Averts Bad Injuries

The action of Walter H. Larsen, 725 West 11th st., a California Oregon Power company truck driver, is credited with avoiding serious injuries in a traffic accident, according to Copco officials and state police.

Larsen was driving toward Medford, about one mile north of the Butte Falls intersection of Highway 62, Jan. 10 when he saw an oncoming car go out of control and begin to spin around on the highway. He turned the truck into a six-foot ditch along the road and stopped.

The car out of control, operated by James Lewis Duncan, route 1, box 644, Eagle Point, struck the ditched truck. The driver and three other youths in the car were saved from possible serious injury by the quick action of the Copco driver, according to company officials.

Larsen suffered a wrenched neck and his passenger, Harry Simons, a bruised arm, in the accident, company officials said. State police officers who later investigated the accident also said the action saved the teenagers from serious injuries.

Investments made by the tenth of the month receive dividends as of the first.

Lester Pearson, Canada's opposition leader and former foreign secretary, called on Dec. 11 for "frank, serious and complete exchange of views, especially between Moscow and Washington, through diplomatic and political channels."

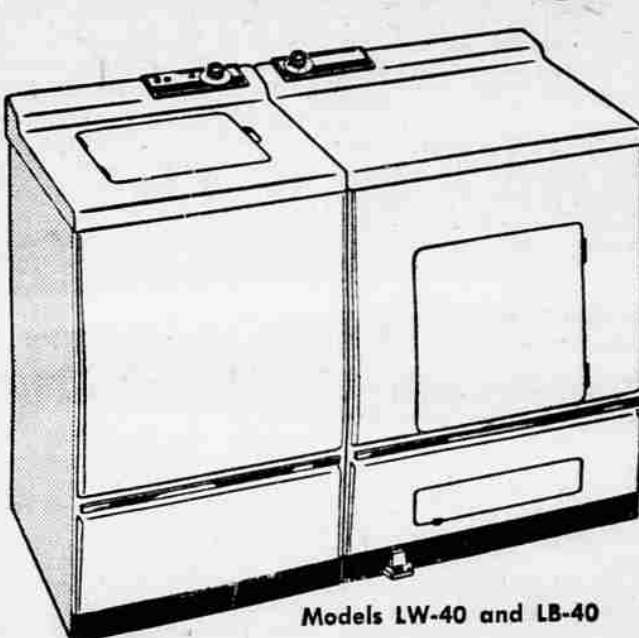

The President answered the Bulganin letters on Jan. 12, taking the position that "summit conferences" do not automatically produce good results. "Cold war problems," he insisted, "should be worked on in advance through diplomatic channels and by our foreign ministers." Let the top-level meeting be held, he concluded, "when he can be sure it will 'hold good hope of advancing the cause of peace and justice in the world.'"

Agree to Possibility
Under Soviet pressure in the glare of world public opinion, the West has agreed to the possibility of another summit conference—in the indefinite future, under prior conditions.
