

Rossellini Request Posiponed by Court

Rome — (AP) — A Rome magistrate's court today postponed indefinitely movie director Roberto Rossellini's legal battle for annulment of his marriage to actress Ingrid Bergman.

Attorneys for Miss Bergman and Rossellini asked Judge Mario Elia for a postponement until a time to be fixed by them and he immediately gave his permission.

Neither Rossellini nor Miss Bergman was present. Rossellini flew to Paris Wednesday night. Miss Bergman was in London completing a picture with Cary Grant.

Rossellini's quest was based on grounds that Swedish law did not recognize Miss Bergman's divorce from her first husband, Swedish surgeon Peter Lindstrom, and that the marriage to Rossellini therefore was not valid.

In London the Swedish actress told United Press she would return to Rome at the end of the week but not in connection with the annulment proceedings.

More farm workers are killed by accident than in any other major occupation — 3,700 last year. Another 310,000 farm workers suffered disabling injuries.

SPECIALIZED BUSINESS SKILLS

COMMAND BETTER PAY TRAIN TODAY!

Behrke-Walker BUSINESS COLLEGE
1122 S.W. STARK ST.
PORTLAND, OREGON

School Officials Appeal for Money To Help Curb Student Lawlessness

New York — (AP) — School and city officials, faced with fresh teen-age violence and parent-teacher criticism of a new school anti-crime program, appealed to the state today for more money to help curb student lawlessness.

Pupils beat or stabbed two student monitors in schools in Manhattan and the Bronx Wednesday, and at another school detectives arrested a 19-year-old youth who admitted, they said, that he had robbed two pupils in the school to get money for narcotics.

Dr. William Jansen, superintendent of schools, and Charles H. Silver, Board of Education president, was to ask state officials and legislators in Albany today for more state aid for the schools. Mayor Robert F. Wagner also planned to confer there with Gov. Averell Harriman on ways to improve New York City's violence-beset schools.

Critics Hit Budget

A barrage of criticism from parent, teacher and citizens groups hit the Board's $520 million budget for 1958-59 when it was submitted formally to the city budget director Wednesday. The budget includes funds for adding six new schools in which youthful trouble makers and delinquents would be segregated from other pupils, as part of an anti-crime program adopted by the Board Tuesday.

Organizations called the program "warmed-over," "superficial," "bankrupt" and "inadequate."

The United Parents association asked the Board to seek more money and charged that its "new" program actually contained nothing new. The Teachers Union said "there is no cheap way out of this school crisis" and the Citizens' Committee for the Children of New York, Inc. said the plan was "boomed to fail" unless it became part of a "realistic" state and local program.

Monitor Stabbed

In the latest outbreaks of violence that in recent weeks has included two rapes and several beatings and robberies, a 14-year-old Negro student stabbed monitor Philip Romano, 15, when the monitor stopped him from entering Henry Hudson Junior High school before the opening bell rang. Romano was hospitalized with two stab wounds near the abdomen.

Later, three students at George Washington High school beat 16-year-old Frank Sloan so severely he was taken to a hospital with a brain concussion.

At the High School of Music and Arts in Manhattan, detectives arrested Robert Asby, 19, who said he was recently released from seven months of hospital treatment for drug addiction. They said he confessed robbing two students of wristwatches and money Jan. 27 and last Tuesday.

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years from retirement. Parents are worried, some pupils tough and belligerent, some just plain scared. Few teachers will talk with reporters.

Mothers, members of the PTA, for a long time have helped keep order in the halls.

Not a Race Question

One significant fact is this: In conversations with teachers, students, parents, police

and small shop merchants in the neighborhood, the race question is seldom mentioned as a reason for the violence.

This has long been a melting pot area in a city that is a melting pot.

It so happens that Negroes were involved in most of these incidents. And the grand jury now investigating Brooklyn schools was called because a judge was angered by the case of a Negro boy who walked into a classroom and threw a white girl.

After sentencing the attacker the judge called the jury. But many incidents in the city's schools have involved white offenders.

What's more, most of the youths involved in the incidents at John Marshall were not from that school. They were involved in what has become a favorite trick for young hoodlums — playing hooky from their own school and raising trouble in another where they are not known.

'Problem Schools'

One proposed remedy is segregation—not by race but segregation of the juvenile delinquents and troublesome students into "problem schools" apart from the others.

A visit to John Marshall disclosed teachers shocked at the suicide of Principal George Goldfarb, a dedicated educator only two years