Racehorses on Relief Stirs Delaware Senator

Washington—Sen. John J. Williams reports that the owners of the race horse Swaps were "apparently down to their last million dollars" when they asked for drought relief.

Greyhound Hearing Slated in Court

Portland — Federal Judge William East scheduled a hearing at 4 p.m. today at which Greyhound bus lines will seek a temporary injunction to get some 200 bus drivers back on the job.

Williams began a Senate attack on "racehorses on relief programs" last Monday. He reported then that Rex and Reed Ellsworth, Arizona ranchers who owned the 1955 Kentucky Derby winner got some $28,000 worth of emergency drought feed.

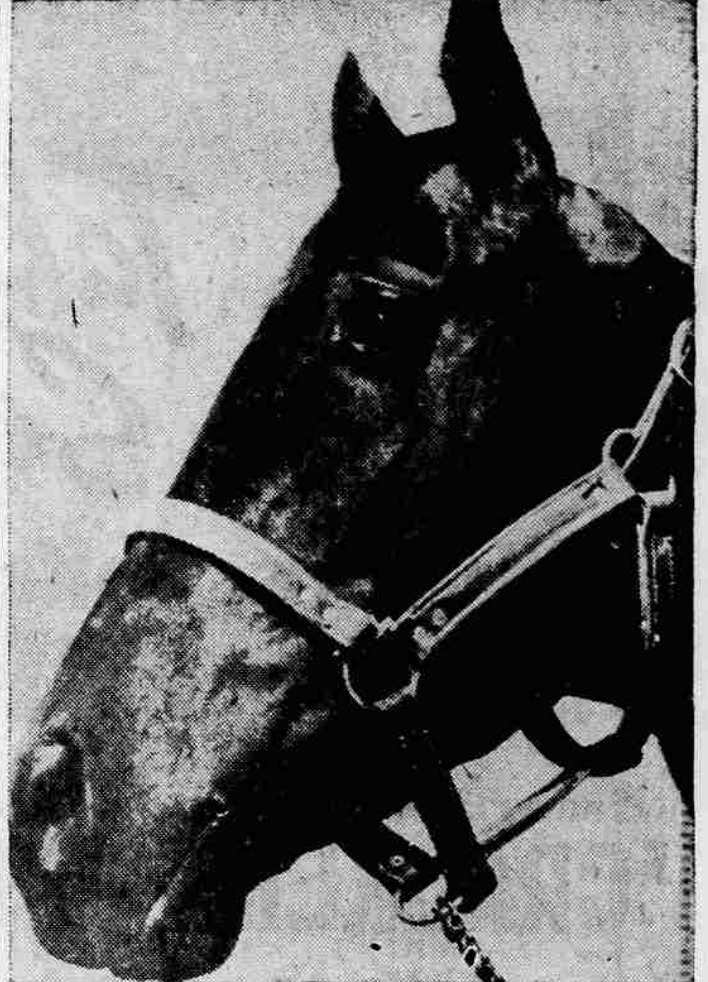

Wednesday the Delaware Republican put into the Congressional Record the owners' statement on an Agriculture Department application blank that "without assistance" they could not maintain their "basic foundation livestock herd."

He said the case was another example of "abuses" in a "well intentioned program." In one previous case, he said, the only animals owned by the borrower were a "polo pony and a bird dog."

Williams noted that the Ellsworths sold Swaps last year for $1 million after the horse had earned them $848,000.

"They were so desperate," he said, "they had to go on relief roles."

Williams said he is glad to note that the Agriculture Department and the Justice Department are looking into the case and may try to recover the money.

SWAPS FREE-LOADING?—Swaps, one of the nation's richest race horses, has been getting free oats and hay from the government, it was charged by Sen. John J. Williams (R-Del.). Williams told the Senate that Rex Ellsworth and his brother, Arizona ranchers and owners of Swaps, were approved to receive more than two million pounds of subsidized feed under the drought relief program.
